UMass will next hit the ice on Friday night at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center when No. 4 Maine makes an appearance in Amherst for a pair of games over the weekend.

Fordham, GW volleyball look for revenge

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Although homecoming weekend has already officially past, the Massachusetts volleyball team will be receiving a homecoming of sorts for the next two weeks.

The Minutewomen will face George Washington (15–8, 9– 5 in the Atlantic 10) and Fordham (8–15, 3–11 in the A–10) this weekend.

The Colonials and the Rams were victims to the Minutewomen the first time they met both teams on the road.

"Looking back I think we were really fortunate to get two wins, both in five games," UMass coach Bonnie Kenny said.

The Minutewomen now will battle the two teams, which they beat in five games the first time, at the friendly confines of Curry Hicks Cage.

The Colonials have just finished disposing of Fordham. And they are one game up on the Minutewomen in conference play.

"When GW is playing at their best, it's tough to find a team in our conference who can beat them," Kenny said. "GW is also tough because they run a six–two offense and the timing is very different. That's something we must adjust to."

The Colonial players who pose a threat for UMass include Tai Bethune, with 228 kills and 187 digs, Gabriela Mojska, with 195 kills and 197 digs, first setter, Suzana Manole, with 197 kills, 400 assists and 276 digs, and the other setter Jill Levey, who has 105 kills, 559 assists and 300 digs.

The Rams enter tonight's game with UMass struggling through what has been a tough conference season. But don't let the 3–11 record fool you, the Rams are much better then their record shows. The Rams pushed the Minutewomen to five games in the Bronx. But this time the Rams face the great crowd at Curry Hicks.

When the Rams enter Curry Hicks on Friday, the Minutewomen will have prepared for setter Lisa Bevill, who has tallied 822 assists and 206 digs.

They will also need to be ready for middle–blocker Marissa Pitroski, who has buried 236 kills and 192 digs. The star for the Rams is junior Cindy Vojtech, who has recorded 205 kills and 240 digs, while collecting 52 blocks.

"Fordham has a huge international outside hitter we're going to have to watch in Vojtech," Kenny said.

The Minutewomen will bring the usual suspects, including Kari Hogancamp, who brings with her 347 kills and her A– 10 conference leading 395 defensive digs, when UMass faces Fordham and GW.

Jill Meyers will be a factor as usual as she contributes with her big swing. She is the UMass kills leader and the best terminator on the team.

The new influences include players like Janeen DeMarte who has filled the role of the other outside hitter. Lymarie Llovet has done a great job terminating kills as of late.

Heather Hollsberg has also been a key component for the UMass team, and will have to be once again this week when the games really start to count for everything.

"We played good offense the last time we played these teams. This time we need a combination of offense and defense. We need ball control, and we can't allow GW or Fordham to take our good younger players out of the match mentally," Kenny said.

Steelers and fans to host GB

By Alan Robinson
Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — In Green Bay, the cheeseheads are wearing a furrowed brow. Any Packers player who leaps into the stands to celebrate a touchdown might find himself being flung back onto the field.

In Pittsburgh, Blitzburgh doesn't apply just to the defense. It refers to the heat the Steelers are feeling from a worried fandom that considers losing the one socially unacceptable faux pas.

Packers' fans fret about the lack of a running game and Brett Favre's proclivity for throwing interceptions. Steelers' fans argue over every Kordell Stewart mistake and nearly melt talk–show lines to skewer coach Bill Cowher for his testy postgame demeanor. Hard to believe that Monday night's game — a matchup that nearly occurred in the Super Bowl in January — is not the real deal.

"There are a lot of games left, the season's only half over," Steelers cornerback Carnell Lake said. "Every game is important, but we've got a long way to go."

A lot of franchises would love to be in the position of the Packers (6-2) and Steelers (5-3), but it's not the place their fans are accustomed to being: first place.

Green Bay trails Minnesota (7-1) by a game in the NFC Central, and has lost to the Vikings at home. Pittsburgh (5-3) is a game down to Jacksonville in the AFC Central after losing at home to Tennessee 41-31.

In the Steelers' first home-field loss to a division rival in more than three years, they trailed 14-7 and 41-15 and needed the 16 late points produced by backup quarterback Mike Tomczak to make the score respectable.

"It was totally unacceptable," Steelers safety Lee Flowers said. "What made it worse was they did it in our house." The Steelers are 6-0 in that house — Three Rivers Stadium — on Monday nights under Cowher but have rarely approached a prime-time game with so much uncertainty.

Stewart threw for a season-high 250 yards and two touchdowns against Tennessee but was benched for the first time in his career. A slump that began in the playoffs last season has continued as the NFL's 31st-rated passer has thrown ten interceptions and only six touchdown passes.

"Brett Favre threw some interceptions his first few seasons but now that he's gone to the Super Bowl a couple times, people forget about those things," Stewart said. "You're going to go through those growing things. But sometimes people want something right now. It's frustrating."

Favre, indeed, is still throwing interceptions; he leads the NFC with 15, which is more in a half-season that he had in the 1996 or 1997 seasons.

Mo Vaughn gets offer $70 million from Anaheim

LOS ANGELES (AP) — The Anaheim Angels have offered slugging first–baseman Mo Vaughn of the Boston Red Sox a six-year deal worth more than $70 million, the Los Angeles Times reported yesterday. The newspaper, citing sources it did not identify, said the Angels also have expressed "serious interest" in Houston pitcher Randy Johnson.

Calls to the Angels were not immediately returned.

On Saturday, a source close to the negotiations told The Associated Press that both the Angels and the Los Angeles Dodgers had made serious offers for Vaughn, although that was denied by Dodgers spokesman Derrick Hall. The Dodgers also are interested in Johnson.

Neither offer was expected to close anytime soon, a source close to the Red Sox slugger's negotiations told The Associated Press. "I was just so shocked that it happened so soon," Vaughn told the Boston Sunday Globe of an offer from Anaheim "... and they just told us what they were going to give us and I was just stunned. They really stepped to the plate and I appreciated it."

Van Huisen did not disappoint, as she collected seven points on three of five shooting while pulling down three rebounds.

However, the UMass player of the game was clearly another Minutewoman making her return from injury.

Junior Jaywana Bradley who sat out last season entirely, came off the bench and notched 15 points to lead the team.

"Initially I was just excited to be ready to play and start off the season," Bradley said. "But I once I got on the court, I was really aggressive and tried to make things happen."

Unfortunately the game was decided almost as soon as it started. The Russian Select Team raced out to a 21–2 advantage in the first seven minutes of play, as UMass failed to find any offensive rhythm.

With 8:55 remaining in the first half Select led 29–6, as the team had connected on five straight three–pointers.

"While we did not know too much about this team, it is very common for foreign teams to feature excellent outside shooters," O'Brien said. "However, I was unhappy to see they had so many open looks throughout the game."

At the half, UMass found itself trailing 43–22. Yelena Novak led the way at that point for Select with nine points, including two of three shooting from behind the arc.

UMass shot an abysmal 35 percent from the field in the half, while Select converted on 59 percent of their attempts.

The second half featured more of the same, as Select outshot UMass 56 to 43 percent from the field for a 36–33 advantage in the period.

Irina Medvedova led the way for Select with 14 points and six assists. Olga Biersianova chipped in with ten points and three assists.

While the loss will mean nothing when the season is done, there are several concerns for the squad at this early juncture.

For one thing, O'Brien will be hard pressed to get the ball distribution she is looking for, with the loss of Sabriya Mitchell.

Kathy Coyner got the start at point guard on Saturday, with Tonia Thomas playing sparingly in reserve.

"Kathy and Tonia are not here to be Sabriya," O'Brien said. "They have to go out and be themselves and help get our offense moving in the right direction."

Coyner dished out four assists in the losing effort, while Thomas had one. Overall, UMass was out–assisted 19–12 by Select.

Furthermore, the team will head into the season opener against St. John's minus two of their players on a permanent basis.

Junior Tory Grant was dismissed from the team for violating team rules, while sophomore guard Kara Trent decided to leave the team, citing personal reasons.

"We are going to work with what we have now," O'Brien said. "I am confident we still have what it takes to compete."

"As long as everyone plays hard and does what they are supposed to do, we will be fine."he Minutewomen will have one week to regroup and prepare for a Red Storm invasion, as UMass will host St. John's at the Mullins Center next Saturday at noon.

The rock spectacle of the Afghan Whigs played up to the Paradise crowd in Boston.

Whigs resurrect glory days in Boston show

By Mike Messaros
Collegian Staff

THE AFGHAN WHIGS
The Paradise
Nov. 6

BOSTON — The Afghan Whigs put on a show this Friday that dangerously toed the line between rock and roll self- parody and rock and roll showmanship. The band, though, distanced itself from other pretenders by bringing with them a catalogue of sinewy and sexy songs, originals and covers. It was a show that recalled the glory days of rock and roll music, from Bruce Springsteen to the Rolling Stones, when shows were fun, when a band gave something to the audience.

Enter lead singer Greg Dulli, who walked onstage in an outfit borrowed from the Marlon Brando casuals collection; long coat draped over his shoulders, sunglasses and big broad-rimmed hat, cigarette dangling from his lips the singer took command of the crowd from the very beginning. Stripping off the coat, and strapping on his guitar languidly, the band started out by playing a snatch of "Papa Was A Rolling Stone," before leaping into "Something Hot," off of their superlative new album 1965.

Between songs, Dulli spoke to the audience, using every showman's trick in the book. He namechecked the city repeatedly, at one point making fun of Red Sox fans and bringing up 1975, when the Cincinnati Reds defeated the Red Sox in the World Series (the band is from Cincinnati). He then began outing various Boston sports heroes, like Carlton Fisk and Bobby Orr (I never knew...). Dulli was the P.T. Barnum of rock, playing it like a preacher at some points, like a smooth operator at others. At one point he left the stage mid-song, only to be dragged back onstage by a roadie. Meatloaf-style. The only thing he forgot to do was breathe fire and handle snakes.

All of this would have fallen apart if the band did not have the skills to back up the showmanship. Backing up the regular band, along with percussionist Doug Falcetti, were two (not one, but two) backup singers and a keyboardist with a ponytail and facial gestures picked up from the Live at Red Rocks John Tesh video (he was good, even if he lacked stage presence). The band was, dare I say, crackerjack and supported Dulli's revivalist pretensions with tight versions of "Blame, Etc.," "Uptown Tonight," "Faded," and "66." Bassist John Curley kept everything flowing together throughout Dulli's hypnotic meanderings.

Halfway through the set, Dulli left the stage (he did it more than once) to give the stage to backup singer Susan Marshall, who sang "My Curse," the aching, disturbing torch song off of Gentlemen. Dulli was not missed for at least a few minutes, as Marshall put a spell on the audience, directing the song at various males before her. "And there's blood on my teeth, as I bite my tongue to speak," she sang, and you thought the injustice had happened to her, and she wanted to let you know.

The only low point came during the first encore, when Dulli took to the keyboards to play a bit of the Beatles' "Dear Prudence" and probably the best song of the new album, "Crazy." The sound was muddled, the keyboard tone was harsh, adding up to make a shaky wall of sound where the melody was lost. The band made up for it later in the encore, as the Beatles' "She Loves You" was inserted at the end of a song, the "yeah, yeah, yeah's" giving a dark, cynical undercurrent that befits the band.

"We're gonna get in trouble for this," Dulli said during the second encore. "They want to set up a disco in here." (One of the worst things about seeing shows at the Paradise is ignominy of being cleared out early to start a disco called, of all things, "Eurohaus.") With that, the band kicked out two great covers — The Rolling Stones' "Beast of Burden" and Prince's "If I Can't Be Your Man." And so the Afghan Whigs gave respect to their roots, closing a two hour show by covering songs by two artists that made music sexy, fun and worth the price of admission.

The Arts & Living desk is currently looking for writers, please come down and speak to editor Bryan McCallister.

Four Pittsburgh Sculptors bring their work to UMass

By Daniele Bernard
Collegian Correspondent

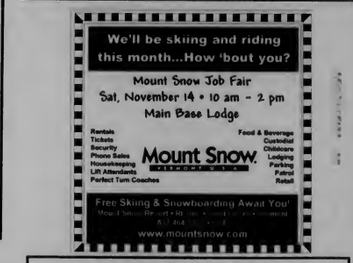
A little piece of the Pittsburgh art world has recently flown the Pennsylvanian coop and landed at UMass. Temporarily residing at the Student Union Visual and Performing Arts Space, the work of Four Pittsburgh Sculptors is currently on display. Exhibiting from Oct. 19 through Nov. 19, the collection is a medley of contemporary sculptural pieces by the visiting artists Barron, Ed, Mauery and Nestor.

Showcasing sculptures of "distinctly different" flavors, these artists ideally aim to capture a sense of unity amongst the stylistic differences of their works.

Presented in a literal circular structure within the gallery space, the artists strive to create a metaphorical circle linking highly individual works into a unified whole. While the concept of artistic individuality bonding to construct a strong whole was the primary objective of the artists, their show doesn't quite achieve that goal.

Impressive in their own right, the works of the sculptors stand strongly on their own, but crumble as whole. With sculptural pieces ranging from organic to mechanical in nature, the show jumps quickly from the first to the last without much of a visual link.

The exhibition initially presents the viewer with an untitled hanging sculpture by Ed. Constructed with steel, wood and concrete, "Untitled" is an imposing structure of sharp, triangular form darting to the floor from holders fixed to the gallery wall. Due to the hard and angular shapes, this piece takes on a daunting quality which bears little connection to the more organic piece by Mauery which follows.



Situated immediately across from Ed's work, Mauery's "52 Solutions" is displayed. A wall fixated hanging piece, "52 Solutions" makes use of synthetic hair and wax as sculpture. A menagerie of color, length and texture, the piece's more organic qualities have very little visual connections to both the preceding and following work.

In a sharp turn from "52 Solutions," the following sculptures by Nestor, Ed and Barron take on a more machine-oriented and mechanical style. In a hodge-podge of wood, metal and other mixed media, the remaining sculptures investigate issues of scale, the nature of machinery and its relation to society.

Impressive in stature and concept, the works stand well on their own but fail to link cohesively as a whole. Henceforth, the exhibition of The Four Pittsburgh Sculptors was well constructed, handsomely presented and individually thought- provoking, yet it lacked the overall sense of strength and unity it sought to achieve.

Field hockey captures A–10 tourney

Browne and Johnston propel Minutewomen, earn tournament honors

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — In her relatively short time as a member of the Massachusetts field hockey team, Vicky Browne has not seen a season that didn't include an Atlantic 10 tournament title.

This weekend, Browne, a senior midfielder from North Shields, England, did her part to guarantee the Minutewomen a 1998 championship. Voted the tournament's Most Valuable Player, Browne scored a pair of goals — her first two of the season — to lift UMass over Rhode Island in yesterday's title game, 4–1.

The Minutewomen downed St. Joseph's, 3–1, in the semifinals at Temple's Geasey Field. URI defeated West Chester 2–1 to advance.

UMass now moves to an NCAA play–in contest against the champion of the Patriot League, Fairfield and Holy Cross played for that title yesterday. The play–in game will be at 2 p.m. tomorrow at Richard F. Garber Field.

"Vicky showed a lot of emotion and a lot of leadership," UMass coach Patty Shea said after capturing her second tournament crown in as many years. "She controlled the game at key points."

Browne, however, was not alone in the Minutewoman effort, as three other UMass players were named to the all–tournament team. Freshman back Anke Bruemmer, senior forward Erica Johnston and senior back Laura Phelan were all rewarded for their efforts.

Johnston, winner of tournament MVP honors last year, gave Browne a run for her money. Johnston's weekend effort produced three goals, including a back–breaking pair against the Hawks in the last four minutes of that semifinal's first half.

"She came out ready to explode," Shea said of Johnston after Saturday's game. "She just fires away, wherever she is. I think part of [her success] is that the goalkeeper is not expecting a lot of shots. She makes the goalkeeper work."

In yesterday's final, Johnston caught URI goalie Jackie Pizzi, an all–tournament selection, for an early 1–0 UMass lead. Getting the ball after two rebounds, Johnston maneuvered by a sprawling Pizzi and knocked the ball to the far right corner of the cage four minutes into the game.

Pizzi and the Ram defense steeled themselves against UMass attacks for the next 22 minutes, until Browne broke through with a shot from the left side.

After Rhode Island cut the advantage to one with a penalty corner goal nine minutes into the second half, Browne iced the game with 24 minutes left on the clock.

"[The goals] were very similar," Browne said. "I basically took the ball left. I just happened to do it twice in a row."

Despite several other opportunities in front of the Ram cage, only Bruemmer could knock home a final tally. With 3:57 remaining in the game, Browne and Patty Robinson set the stage as Bruemmer unloaded for a penalty corner goal.

Bruemmer also contributed on defense, combining with Robinson, Phelan and Kerry Ann Jaggasar to stymie their opposition's attacks all weekend. In fact, the Rams only came up with three offensive corners in the game.

"Anke and Laura were outstanding. They are two leaders back there," Shea said. "Anke plays like a seasoned veteran, which is sometimes surprising because she is a freshman."

As a freshman, this weekend was Bruemmer's first taste of conference tourney success. The A–10 tournament win is the third in a row for the Minutewomen, who last year defeated West Chester in Amherst.

"This shows our group has a lot of class and a lot of pride in wearing the UMass logo," Shea said. "They don't want to give up the tournament. If someone else is going to win it, they are going to have to earn it. That shows the caliber of players and the history of this program."

PHILADELPHIA — It was a great weekend for the Massachusetts (13–7) women's field hockey team and its seniors. It culminated with senior Vicky Browne throwing her stick in joy and jumping into the arms of fellow senior Laura Phelan, after defeating URI in the final of the Atlantic 10 Championships.

The UMass victories were due to an entire–team effort, but when the pressure was on, three seniors stepped to the forefront. Not only did these three seniors provide all but one of UMass' goals, but they also were great defensively as well as providing leadership during a pressure–packed tourney situation.

The Minutewomen counted on three key components in winning A–10's this weekend. Seniors Erica Johnston, Browne and Phelan.

The Minutewomen received contributions from several different players, but Phelan, Johnston and Browne left it all on the field in what could have been their last set of games.

UMass stepped on to Geasey Field on the campus of Temple University, which was the sight of this year's A–10 tournament, on Saturday afternoon against St. Joseph's. It was UMass' first game in ten days and they might have been rusty. This proved to be true for the first 30:39, before Johnston exploded for two quick goals late in the first half. The pair of goals boosted UMass to an eventual 3–1 win in the semifinal.

"We hadn't played a game in a week and half, and Johnston's two goals at the end of the half took them [St. Joe's] out of their game," Shea said.

Johnston was also a threat during the final game. She scored one goal (three for the tournament) while having several great opportunities late in the URI game.

"Both Erica and Vicky played really well," said UMass coach Patty Shea. "They played with great emotion and leadership, and really helped some of our freshman and sophomores when they became a little nervous."

Phelan was also a huge factor. The senior played superbly during the entire tournament; whether it was goal scoring or helping out on defense she came through.

Phelan capped the St. Joe's game with a goal at 7:27 of the second half, when she lifted a screamer past goalie Vanessa Cardinale. But Phelan's leadership on defense and in the midfield provided the strength the Minutewomen needed to win both games.

When UMass needed a great offensive performance they turned to the unlikeliest of goal scorers. Browne, who hadn't scored a goal coming into they A–10 tourney, scored two in the 4–1 finals victory over URI. The North Shields, England native also had an assist (her 16th assist of the season) on the last goal of the URI game.

"Vicky played brilliantly on the field, she took over," Shea said.

"Vicky was outstanding. Those were her first two goals of the year; this was the time to do it," Johnston said of teammate Vicky Browne's play.

Browne was also named to A–10 All–Tournament Team, while also receiving the tournament MVP Award.

"I thought that Erica got it (referring to the MVP Award). But Erica was outstanding," Browne said.

Browne also commented on the pressure of playing in her last A–10.

"You must play every game like it's your last," Browne said.

UM football challenged by Rhody

KINGSTON, RI — A lesson learned too late in the season, which will not be able to be put into use for the remainder of the 1998 campaign, almost cost the No. 12 Massachusetts football team in their tilt with the Rhode Island Rams.

Never underestimate that extra push on Senior Day. It was a lesson learned, if anything, for next season. Rhode Island gave the Minutemen all they could handle, but UMass held the Rams to 60 total yards in the second half. That allowed the offense to finally get on track and break through for a 23–13 victory.

The crowd at Meade Stadium honored its graduating group, Saturday's game, though, turned into a microcosm of the frustrations URI has suffered from all season long. Khari Samuel, who has keyed the Minuteman defense all year long, fittingly turned the keys on the bus by returning an interception for the game's final touchdown, all but ending Rhode Island's hopes.

Fittingly, to all but knock Rhode Island out, Samuel intercepted a Jeff Weaver pass and ran it in from 26 yards out for the score. While the defense celebrated behind the endzone, the offense on the sidelines must have let out a sigh of relief. They were held almost 100 yards shy of their season average by the conference's stingiest defense.

Rhode Island took a 10–0 lead into the second half, but they, too, had difficulties in the scoring department. Those difficulties were magnified in the second half when the Rams' offense could only accumulate 60 total yards, allowing UMass to win the field position game. On the day, URI converted on only 2 of 14 third downs.

"This is probably the best defensive game we've had all year," Whipple said. "I thought the defense stepped up and played outstanding."

From the beginning, it looked like Rhode Island had the answer to knocking UMass (7–2, 5–1 in the Atlantic 10) off of its first place pedestal. The Minuteman offense unraveled in the first half, coming up empty on the scoreboard for only the second time in any half this season.

"They just made the decision to come out in the second half to play a lot harder with a lot more concentration," Whipple said. "Today, we were in slow–motion. It felt like we were in tar on offense."

Quarterback Todd Bankhead, who had an otherwise miserable game, scored on a naked bootleg halfway through the third quarter to finally knock the zero off the scoreboard. Bankhead would complete 24 of 35 passes for 211 yards, but was sacked five times and threw four interceptions on the afternoon, victimized by constant blitzing.

His counterpart, Weaver, spelled starter Rudy Bulger, but only notched 68 passing yards on the afternoon. Last week, Weaver completed 17 of 20 passes in leading the Rams to a victory over James Madison.

Runningback Marcel Shipp compensated for Bankhead's off–day by registering his seventh consecutive 100–yard game, gathering 169 yards on 30 carries. His seventh

Minuteman offense struggles, nearly lets victory escape

KINGSTON, RI — The fans traveling from Amherst, Mass. to Kingston, R.I. for Saturday's game between the Massachusetts football team and the Rhode Island Rams probably thought they made a wrong turn somewhere in Munson.

The first half had just ended at what they assumed to be Meade Stadium at the University of Rhode Island, and the team clad in maroon and white had no points.

UMass, the team that the fans had come to see, averages almost 35 points a game, and regularly has 20 on the scoreboard by halftime. This couldn't possibly be the right stadium.

It was. After two quarters, the usually high–octane offensive attack of the Minutemen had shown that they were completely out of gas.

"I had a feeling that we were either going to play outstanding, and play our best game of the season or we were going to struggle — and unfortunately, we struggled, especially on offense," UMass Coach Mark Whipple said.

On three consecutive drives in the first half, Massachusetts could only muster two yards or less, including one in which they went backwards two yards. Eight Minuteman drives on the afternoon failed to reach 30 yards.

UMass passer Todd Bankhead had thrown two interceptions by the half, and would throw two more before the final gun. During the course of the game, in which the Massachusetts offense scored only 16 of the team's uncharacteristically low 23 points, Bankhead was sacked five times for 35 yards' worth of losses.

All–American candidate Marcel Shipp and his fellow UMass running backs couldn't quite get in rhythm in the first half, collectively rushing for only 63 yards compared to the Rams' 122.

The offensive futility did not completely end in the second half, although UMass did manage to sustain three scoring drives. In the third and fourth quarters, the Minutemen were 0 for 6 on third down conversions.

The Rhode Island defense, who entered the contest ranked first in the Atlantic 10, simply showed up to play. Star defensive lineman Frank Ferrara recorded three sacks.

From the Ram defensive backfield, Ron Iannoti added 13 tackles and an interception, while Chucky Wesley picked off two of Bankhead's tosses.

"We kept the ball in front of us, and I think we put good pressure on them," URI Coach Floyd Keith said, explaining his squad's success.

Again, in tense fashion, the Minutemen were victorious despite their offensive struggles, either showing immense heart or exposing serious questions about their team.

Russia's best clobbers UM in women's hoops

The Massachusetts women's basketball team opened their 1998–99 campaign with a 79–55 exhibition loss to the Russian Select Team on Saturday at the Mullins Center.

While the game was never close, Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien expressed little concern over the outcome.

"We did not come into this game thinking that the final score was important," O'Brien said. "I was concerned with the overall effort of the team, but not whether we won or lost."

For the UMass faithful that attended the contest, the highlight was the return of Kelly Van Huisen to the lineup.

The sophomore guard played in her first game since tearing her ACL, six games into last season.

World War I fighting ceased at last minute

OUDENAARDE, Belgium (AP) — Among the endless rows of crosses in cemeteries along the front lines of the Great War, few are more poignant than those bearing the inscription "Nov. 11, 1918" — armistice day.

After four years of unprecedented carnage, men kept falling even in the war's final hours — long after the German enemy had given up hope of winning.

The French army and the U.S. 37th and 91st Divisions launched one of the final offensives of World War I on Nov. 10, 1918, near this medieval Belgian town, trying to capture one more hill before the weapons were finally put down.

The 37th Division alone lost 22 men in the final 24 hours of fighting before the guns fell silent at 11 a.m. on Nov. 11, 1918. Those men and 4,500 other Americans who died in the last weeks of fighting will be honored tomorrow during a ceremony at the war memorial in Oudenaarde.

In nearby Ypres, Belgian King Albert II and British Queen Elizabeth II will also honor the slain troops, over 10 million from a host of nations.

NATION

India, Pakistan told to end nuclear programs

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Clinton will lift some sanctions against India and Pakistan but wants both countries to take further steps toward curbing their nuclear programs before he reschedules his visit to the region, the White House said yesterday.

The president will seek to restore International Monetary Fund assistance to both countries and lift prohibitions on their participation in investment and trade programs run by the Export–Import Bank and the Overseas Private Investment Corp., said White House spokesman Joe Lockhart.

The investment programs were worth $300 million to India before the sanctions were imposed. Pakistan did not participate in them. Clinton also will pursue, with other G–7 nations, a plan for an IMF program for Pakistan, which has $1.5 billion in outstanding debt and is suffering a financial crisis made worse by the sanctions, Lockhart said.

"Given the state of the economy and the issues that Pakistan faces domestically and economically, this step is prudent and appropriate," Lockhart said. "Allowing (Clinton) the flexibility in using these sanctions can often be more productive than the rigid implementation of these."

India and Pakistan were subjected to a series of sanctions last spring after they carried out nuclear tests. The two South Asian rivals announced a moratorium on further testing, and promised to adhere to the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty by September 1999.

Majors fair offers direction; students look into interests

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Over 70 majors will be represented as the annual University of Massachusetts Majors Fair gets under way today at 6 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom.

Sponsored by the Pre–Major Advising Services and the Honors Program, the fair will showcase the variety of majors that the University offers to students.

The fair will direct non–majors and pre–majors as to various majors available on campus.

But Susan Machala, academic advisor of Undergraduate Advising and Academic Support Center (UAASC), feels that declared majors will also benefit from the fair.

"This'll give students the opportunity to take the first step towards exploring the fields they might be interested in," Machala said. "A showcase of the academic smorgasbord is a unique way to explore the impressive range of majors available at the university."

Departmental heads, advisors, and graduate students will be on hand to answer questions and assist students in learning more about undergraduate majors.

Academic departments and services will also be available to talk to students about future careers in their field.

"Students feel it is helpful to speak formally with a faculty advisor," Machala said. "Making contact with a departmental person is a difficult first step, and this will help people who are hesitant to seek out advising support."

Instead of distributing flyers and brochures, the fair advisors will focus on attending the needs of the students and in directing them to the appropriate resources.

With more than 5,000 undeclared or pre–major students, Machala feels that most are unaware of the available resources.

"Only if you are aware and informed enough will you find the appropriate academic resources to succeed at the University," Machala said. "On such a large campus, a lot of students don't know where to start in looking for major advising help."

Compared to a small liberal arts college, Machala feels that the UMass campus offers a wider array of academic resources and advising services.

The Pre–Major Advising Services, located in Goodell, focuses on accomplishing this.

"The goal of all education should enable students to be more independent and responsible for their own education," Machala said. "We want to give them the information so they can make the best choices for themselves."

A Veterans' Day with reality

Understanding Private Ryan focus of event

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

It sticks in the mind — the first war scene in Saving Private Ryan, the Allied D–Day Omaha Beach landing in Normandy.

The rapid fire and the resultant falling soldiers remain like a photograph in memory. Especially for someone who was there.

In a program paralleling Saving Private Ryan, a veteran who was there at the landing in Normandy will speak along with a panel of World War II and Vietnam veterans about real war experiences.

"Understanding Private Ryan," held in observance of Veterans' Day, will be held tonight at 7 p.m. in the auditorium of the Amherst–Pelham Regional Middle School. The event was organized by the Veterans' Education Project and is co–sponsored by the Amherst–Pelham Regional Middle and High School.

"This event is planned in what we feel is the true spirit of Veterans' Day," Rob Wilson, Director of the Veterans' Education Project, said. "Not only to honor veterans and their sacrifices, but also to reflect on the costs and ambiguities of war, and to reflect on its lessons."

The three World War II veterans and one Vietnam veteran who will speak tonight have been trained by Veterans' Education Project organizers to share their oral histories in area schools.

The purpose of the Veterans' Education Project is to inform the public of the realities of war.

"The mission of the fictional soldiers in Spielberg's movie was to save Private Ryan," Wilson said. "Our mission is to understand him."

Tonight's program will deal with issues of war that are sometimes overlooked, including the effect of war on soldiers and their families.

The veterans composing the panel come from varying backgrounds and will offer a wide range of viewpoints.

John Tenanes enlisted in the army in 1942, and landed on Omaha Beach on D–Day morning.

He spent the remainder of the war serving in the European theater, and ended his military service working as an interpreter in the post–war Military Government program that hunted war criminals and supervised the Nuremberg Trials. Tenanes now works as a barber in Northampton.

Paul Slater enlisted in the Navy in 1942 and served on a destroyer escort in the North Atlantic and Mediterranean Seas for most of the war. He was a professor at Hampshire College, and is now retired and living in Northampton.

David Cohen was drafted into the army and served in General George Patton's Third Army. His unit fought through France, Belgium and into Germany, where Cohen and others helped

Moore speaks of student involvement in politics

Michael Moore addresses students at the Fine Arts Center last night.

By Ryan Coughlin
Collegian Correspondent

Writer, filmmaker and political satirist Michael Moore gave a lecture sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program at the University's Fine Arts Center last night.

The creator of Roger and Me, "TV Nation" and The Big One, as well as the writer of the bestselling book Downsize This: Random Threats from an Unarmed American, Moore showed short clips of his television series from the past and gave sneak previews of sketches yet to come.

He started off the evening by criticizing the recently resigned Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich, pointing out that his county in Georgia receives more federal money than most do, in spite of the fact that Gingrich opposed "Big Government." He joked about the backlash against Gingrich's politics that caused his departure, "a month ago it was like Clinton was gone, now it's like Newt."

He received a positive response from the crowd when he questioned the reasoning of the impeachment push from the republicans while the country was sick of the hearings. He called the Starr Report "forty–million for cigars and altoids." He remarked "the basic instinct of politicians is survival," noting how America responded in the last election, in one of his skits for the future season of "TV Nation," he said he paid only $550 for a group of people dressed as pilgrims to lead a Washington witch–hunt, citing the savings from the Independent Council's own investigation.

Moore showed that his political ideology leaned far far to the left, yet he criticized this country's strongest liberal base, the democrats. He blamed them for being too conservative, saying "we live in a one party system, the democrats are almost like the republicans." He called Clinton "the best republican president ever," hypothesizing that a republican "could never hurt the poor or push

Gene therapy helps heart patients grow bypasses

By Daniel Q. Haney
Associated Press

DALLAS — For the first time, doctors have shown that by inserting extra genes into the heart, they can enable patients to grow their own bypasses.

The approach could someday spare patients the need for bypass surgery, in which a piece of blood vessel is grafted into place to create a detour around a blockage.

Experts say this new gene–insertion procedure, tested initially in the legs and now in the heart, represents the first example of gene therapy actually correcting a human ill.

Several competing teams of doctors have injected a gene that makes a protein called vascular endothelial growth factor — or VEG–F, pronounced vedge–eff — into the hearts of people who have clogged vessels but are too sick to undergo ordinary bypass surgery or angioplasty. Ordinarily, the gene only does its work during fetal development in the womb.

The doctors found clear, and in some cases dramatic, evidence that the gene prompts the heart to sprout tiny new blood vessels to nourish blood–starved muscle and relieve crippling chest pain. Nevertheless, the procedure is still highly experimental and is probably several years away from routine use.

"We are trying to take damaged adult organs and return them to youth," said Dr. Ronald G. Crystal of Cornell Medical School in New York City. He and others reported their findings yesterday at a meeting of the American Heart Association in Dallas.

Still unclear is whether this kind of genetic manipulation will work any better than a more direct medical approach — giving people doses of the protein made by the gene. At a conference last March, doctors from the University of Minnesota showed that the VEG–F protein appeared to ease angina in 13 of 15 patients treated. Among those receiving injections of the VEG–F gene were 6 patients of Dr. Jeffrey Isner of St. Elizabeth's Medical Center in Boston, all of them heart attack victims who suffered excruciating chest pain at even the mildest exertion.

Some of Isner's patients were taking as many as 60 nitroglycerin tablets a week for their pain. Now all have improved substantially, and the average dose is 2 1/2 pills weekly. Of the 11 patients who have been followed up for at least three months, six are entirely free of pain.

A variety of tests, including nuclear scans, show improved blood flow to the patients' heart muscle, even though the blood vessels created by the treatment are too small to be seen.

"We are extremely encouraged about this therapy," Isner said. Among his patients is Floyd Stokes, a 58–year–old peanut farmer from DeLeon, Texas.

Distinguished professor shares advice for university students

A distinguished Professor of Ethnic Studies at the University of California at Berkeley, Ronald Takaki, delivered a lecture entitled "The Coming Multicultural Millennium" at Amherst College's Johnson Chapel last night.

Formerly known as "Ten Toes Takaki" in his days as a "serious surfer" in Hawaii, Ronald Takaki shared some of his experiences as a young Asian American college student in the days before affirmative action. After the speech, he shared advice for current University of Massachusetts students.

"[The campus community] did not, could not, see me as an American," he said. "But it was not the fault of my fellow white students. What had they

Doctor disciplined in chemotherapy overdoses

By Dave Howland
Associated Press

BOSTON — Four years after prescribing an overdose of chemotherapy that killed one woman and seriously sickened another, a doctor has been officially rebuked by the state of Massachusetts. The state's Board of Registration in Medicine found Dr. James Foran guilty of medical malpractice for prescribing four times the proper dosage chemotherapy drugs to the women at the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute in November 1994, the board announced yesterday. The overdoses sickened Maureen Bateman, a teacher from North Andover, and killed Betsy A. Lehman, a 39-year-old health columnist for The Boston Globe. Both had breast cancer.

"Dr. Foran engaged in conduct which calls into question his competence to practice medicine, including practicing medicine with negligence on repeated occasions," the board wrote in a consent order signed by Foran last week.

But the board also decided to allow Foran, now living in England, to apply to practice medicine again in Massachusetts. It issued a three-year suspension of that right retroactive to October 1995 — making him eligible to reapply starting this month. Board spokesman Charles Moore said while Foran was free to apply, his disciplinary record would be taken into account by the board.

Lehman died of a heart attack at the hospital on Dec. 3, 1994. Bateman's heart was so severely damaged that specialists thought she, too, would die. She slowly recovered, but developed cancer of the liver, lung and heart last year and died in May 1997 after declining further chemotherapy.

According to the consent order, Foran prescribed four times the intended dose of two drugs — cyclophosphamide and Mesna — to both women.

He wrote the first four-day prescription for Lehman on Nov. 14, 1994, and two days later for Bateman.

Foran, who now holds a research position in oncology at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in London, had gotten his medical license in Massachusetts the previous year.

learned about me in their courses about United States History?"

His experiences at Worcester College in Ohio, and later at the University of California at Berkeley, helped mold Takaki into the influential historical scholar he is today. Author of many award-winning books that present alternative histories of America, he was also instrumental in establishing the American Cultures requirement at Berkeley. According to an Amherst College press release, he has become a "leading national spokesperson for multicultural education."

In this capacity, Takaki addressed the large crowd that gathered in Johnson Chapel about the need for more multiculturally diverse curricula in the Amherst area.

"[At Berkeley] we decided as a faculty that a more ethnically inclusive curriculum is also a more accurate curriculum," he said. "There is the mistaken notion that America equals white, rooted in a master narrative of American history constructed by eminent American historians."

Most of his lecture openly challenged the prevailing histories and ideologies of white America. He explained that a cultural transformation is occurring and America needs to prepare for it.

"Soon, whites will be a minority. We will all be minorities," he added. "Are we going to resist this diversity or embrace it?"

As part of the presentation, Takaki taught a mini-history lesson to the crowd. Starting with a discussion of the migration of Irish immigrant women in the early 19th century to New England textile mills, he asked members of the audience how many Irish migrated during this period.

After a short silence and a few wrong answers he said, "You mean, all these smart people in the five college area and no one knows the answer? I see that you need this required course too."

He expanded the discussion to the impacts of the cotton industry on enslaved Africans, the expansion of American territories in Texas and California, the exploitation of the Mexicans, and the importation of Chinese railroad workers.

"See how our pasts intersected one another?" he said.

He continued by sharing some unheard voices of Chinese American railroad workers, and closed the lecture by saying, "Multiculturalism does not lead to a disunited America. Rather, it is monoculturalism that divides us."

In a question and answer period following the lecture, he encouraged students to ask questions and address the faculty members and administrators present, including Amherst College President Tom Gerety. One Amherst College student questioned Takaki about student involvement in the Berkeley American Cultures requirement initiative.

Takaki responded by saying the initiative would not have been done without students, who rallied, demonstrated, and even occupied buildings in order to get their message across to the faculty of the University.

"[These demonstrations] led to a tremendous crisis on campus and began a two year intense debate," he said. "It would be great to have a debate like that take place here."

In many ways, the student activism Takaki spoke about echoed recent student activism at the University of Massachusetts. In an interview after the lecture, Takaki addressed multicultural issues in the UMass community, specifically the 1996 Goodell Takeover and recent student initiatives for an Asian American Studies program.

"It [The Goodell Takeover] is an example of students becoming actors in education," he said. "Students don't have too many channels to express themselves. [Such action] is a way for students to express themselves. It's democracy in action."

He spoke of student activism in universities across the country, which has resulted in an increase of multicultural programs in those institutions.

"Northwestern University responded to student hunger strikes with two new [Asian American] positions, [as did] the dean of Princeton...and Columbia University," he said. "UMass should just recognize what's happening on other campuses."

In response to a question about an Asian American Studies program, he added, "UMass is a national university; it has to offer a national curriculum. That would be my message to the University of Massachusetts and the student activists."

NAFTA as he did."

The crowd cheered when he spoke of how Hillary Clinton would be a good president, saying, "I would pay to see her kick the crap out of him in the south lawn."

He did inspire some of the audience to get involved, saying, "unfortunately, this party [the democrats] has been dead as a duck, ...if you go to the Hampshire [county] party there will not be more than five or ten people, the rest are just hacks, if you go over with twenty of your friends then you can take over the party." He responded to students who complained about their tuition "get involved so that the Republican [Celluccl] who controls Boston sends more money for higher education."

Moore hinted of a skit that would be in the future season on "TV Nation." In response to the homophobic signs at the funeral of college student Matthew Shepard, Moore came up with the idea of the "Michael Moore Sodom Mobile," a van with him and a few gay men inside. They drove around the more conservative parts of the country, making a political scene. On one of his stops, Trent Lott's front yard, he said, he received seven police cruisers.

He was generally well received by the UMass community, almost all of the attendees were impressed. Emery Dolans, a sophomore English major, called it "a wicked delight. Once again, he gave a great show, covered all the bases. He dropped his level of speech for the crowd and it went really well." Danielle Benvenuto, a junior plant and soil sciences major, said, "I thought he was hilarious. I was glad he came to our school because he presented a good look at an issue that people should be aware of. I just hope that people opened their minds for this."

Yet, in spite of his appeal, Dan McLeod, a junior sociology major, questioned Moore's journalistic style, "I don't think he's legitimate, I think he just exploits popular left ideology for his own reputation," he said. "He manipulated information in Roger and Me [the actual number of workers laid off by GM] and he said he didn't go to college [to increase his image as part of the working class] but he went to community college."

Whatever his style, Moore admitted in context that he gives 25 to 50 percent of his annual income to charity.

Hoover's notes unveil frustration, agents careless watch of Oswald

By Deb Riechmann
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — After President Kennedy's assassination, an angry J. Edgar Hoover scribbled stinging remarks in the margins of an FBI memo detailing how agents had failed — sometimes for "asininc" reasons, Hoover wrote — to keep a close eye on Lee Harvey Oswald in the months before the 1963 shooting.

The FBI memo was among more than 400,000 Kennedy-related documents released yesterday at the National Archives.

It has long been known that the FBI mishandled its pre-assassination investigation of Oswald, who had been watched by agents since 1959 when he defected to the former Soviet Union. But archivists say this is the first time they've seen the Dec. 10, 1963, memo containing Hoover's curt, handwritten remarks about how the bureau bungled the case.

The 11-page memo to Clyde Tolson, the No. 2 official at the FBI, was written by James Gale, who conducted an internal probe that revealed "a number of investigative and reporting delinquencies in the handling of the Oswald case."

The memo argues that based on Oswald's defection, his tendencies toward Cuban leader Fidel Castro and other details known to FBI agents, Oswald should have been placed on the FBI's Security Index, a list of people considered threats to public officials or national security.

The list is available to the Secret Service, which uses the information in its efforts to protect the president. FBI field personnel told Gale they did not think Oswald met the criteria for being on the list.

If Oswald had been on the list, law enforcement officials probably would have been more aggressive in checking his status before Kennedy traveled to Dallas.

"Certainly no one in full possession of all his faculties can claim Oswald didn't fall within this criteria," Hoover wrote at the bottom of the memo.

John Newman, a University of Maryland professor and former intelligence officer who has written a book on Oswald, said Hoover was angry because FBI agents in Washington, Dallas, New Orleans and New York all had been following Oswald's movements yet were "flat on their feet" in the weeks before the assassination.

"Hoover is saying in earthy terms the obvious: How could they have been so incompetent?," Newman said. "Hoover's written remarks make clear the level of incompetence and embarrassment of the bureau's handling of Lee Harvey Oswald."

Gale's memo cites several FBI missteps in Dallas.

FBI Agent James Hosty, who was assigned to Oswald in Dallas, said the bureau wanted to interview Oswald's wife, Marina, but didn't do it in March 1963 because Oswald had been "drinking to excess and (had) beat up (his) wife on several occasions." Hosty said the Dallas bureau opted for a "60-day cooling-off period."

This is "certainly an asinine excuse," Hoover wrote.

After the cooling-off period, the FBI couldn't find Oswald or his wife.

A limit on liberty

Last week the U.S. Supreme Court examined an Iowa marijuana case in which a man claims Iowa police illegally searched his car, which lead to his arrest. "NBC Nightly News" reported that a recently passed Iowa law allows officers to search a person's car without probable cause any time after a traffic violation.

NBC said an Iowa officer stopped Patrick Knowles for speeding and, after giving him the ticket, searched his car without probable cause. Only by this search did the officer obtain the illegal substance which forced Knowles to spend ninety days in jail.

If the justices were to agree with Iowa, it is likely several other states will follow, since there would be no worry of an expensive appeal like this. However, by NBC's clips, it seems likely the justices will reject the law, and erase the scrutiny this law subjects us to.

"America is not the first country to hint at circumventing freedom under the guise of protection. For example, Indonesia is known for its low crime rates and spotless streets, but also for its very limited freedoms."

Jason Wiesenbach

The likelihood that police would always search a car after a traffic violation, unless an individual police department adopted such a policy, seems inconceivable. With that said, then the possibility of police further perpetuating racial, sexual, and visual biases is inevitable.

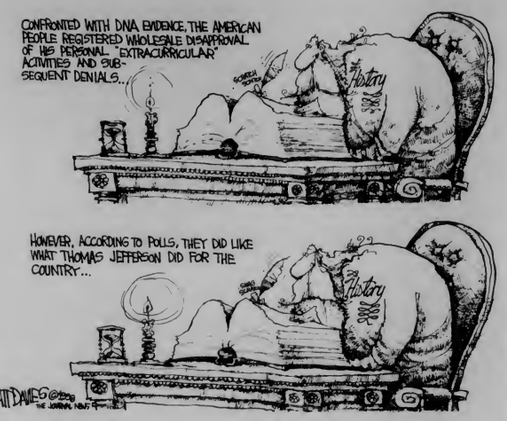
For some reason, I doubt police officers would be pulling harmless senior citizens out of their cars on cold nights just because of speeding. Not that it is not possible, but police will assume no senior citizen to be suspect of drug possession or other illegal activity. Those that are typically singled out for suspicion, conversely, would be further exposed to it with this law.

Even if the Court overturns the Iowa law, the trend this decade has been for more police scrutiny. This past summer, money was allocated for video cameras at highly traveled intersections in Massachusetts, including Springfield. The cameras, present in other cities across the country, are installed to deter running red lights. They photograph the violating driver and the car's license plate, and issue a ticket automatically in the mail.

A noticeable difference in the way law enforcement is practiced exists here. No longer does anyone have to see the violation, but we rely on technology to do the work for us. While this may free up a few police officers to do other work, is this really necessary to protect society from itself? I am not endorsing running red lights and the accidents it causes, but there is a point at which freedom of choice would become a distant memory.

It may seem contradictory, but the only way for freedom to exist is to allow a country's citizens to go about their business unwatched — which may involve committing crimes. The burden of proof must be placed with the enforcers, who can only make arrests based on hard evidence of a crime. No, this may not prevent the crimes the majority deem harmful, but laws themselves cannot prevent all crime anyway. A person must internalize a law as more important than his or her personal desires, in order to eliminate all crime.

Some may argue that a more powerful police force can apprehend more felons, supposedly making us feel safer. True, a police-run state that has video cameras at every intersection will be safer. However, fear of being caught not only will be a constant, but citizens will then think of their "freedom from" first, instead of their "freedom to" do things, which is the foundation of liberty.



America is not the first country to hint at circumventing freedom under the guise of protection. For example, Indonesia is known for its low crime rates and spotless streets, but also for its very limited freedoms. Besides banning chewing gum to keep the environment clean, they also have a high-pitched tone that sounds inside your car every time you speed on many city streets. Is this where America wants to go: the government monitoring your every move so, superficially, everything gleams of perfection?

If Americans wanted to be controlled, there would be no argument that searches should be conducted on anyone suspect of a crime. But living in a controlled police state with limited freedoms based on the idea of protecting society from itself is not in human nature. If pushed far enough, a revolution is the result. People would not put their life below their beliefs if humans wanted to bow to any authority.

The balance of freedom versus control can only be maintained if the public respects the laws it should follow. If police look at people not as law-abiding citizens but as potential felons, then the freedom versus control balance shifts away from freedom. I do not endorse lack of control, for in today's America lack of law certainly could never work. America still needs a level of control, but the control should focus mainly on crimes that have hurt others, such as violent crimes. Focusing on petty crimes, the ones in which the majority of citizens are involved, creates resentment of authority, not respect.

Stripping us of our Fourth Amendment right against unauthorized searches will not stop crime, only make us respect government even less and provide grounds for a future civil war. Security should not be derived from scrutiny, but from a mutual understanding between citizens that certain acts are harmful to others.

"The body" politic

I wanted to write a column on last week's election full of insider reaction and analysis. I have my own "Beltway insider." It's not a high ranking White House aide or anything, but it is my old RA, Phil. He has a job working for the Democratic National Committee (DNC) in Washington and he tells me that he knows Al Gore, so that qualifies him as an insider.

Rob Sullivan

I don't have any insider information right now because Phil hasn't e-mailed me back in a few weeks. I had all sorts of questions for him. I asked him who Al Gore was considering as his running mate in 2000. I asked him if it was true that Ken Starr's daughter is attending Stanford this fall with Chelsea Clinton. I asked him what Monica Lewinsky was really like (they were interns at the same time).

"Say that Al Gore is a man of steel; of cold, inflexible steel. I like the campaign slogan, "Al Gore: An iron fist for a stronger America."

But the only e-mails I get back are stupid forwards and Bill Clinton jokes. If that's how they spend all their time down at the DNC, we all better get used to saying "President Kemp."

Even if he doesn't e-mail me back, it's good to have an insider in Washington. I can use him to give the Democrats useful advice. I know he reads his email, and I hope he passes along my good ideas to the powers that be.

The first thing I ever told him is that Al Gore needs a fresh approach to his run for the Oval Office in the year 2000. The trick is to play to his strengths. Everyone makes fun of him for being wooden, so I say he should take that to the next step. Say that Al Gore is a man of steel; of cold, inflexible steel. I like the campaign slogan, "Al Gore: An iron fist for a stronger America."

It's what the people want. In this era of growing choices and sensory overload from multiplying media outlets the people are confused. They want someone to unite their hearts and minds. They want to walk together in one step. Al Gore can bring that to them. Plus, he will create thousands of new jobs in his new Ministry of Order.

I've also told him to be wary of Minnesota governor elect and former professional wrestler Jesse "The Body" Ventura. He may have run for governor under the Reform Party banner, but I clearly remember him supporting "The Million Dollar Man" Ted Dibiase in the late '80s. If that doesn't show a hidden Republican agenda, I don't know what does. Political fanatic and professional wrestler are the only two vocations where it is acceptable to scream into a microphone. Should "The Body" decide to run for higher office he may be able to whip the people into a frenzy with inflamed rhetoric.

Perhaps I'm being a little alarmist about Jesse Ventura. Even if he did become a Republican President, he would almost certainly have a change of heart midway through his term and turn on his former comrades-in-arms. That's just how these guys are built.

What I want most from my political connection is for my old RA to hook me up with one of the Gore daughters. I don't care which one; they're all beautiful young women. I think I'd get along fine with the family. I'd just have to make sure that I turn down my Wu-Tang Clan CDs when Mom comes by to visit.

I'd love to date a Gore daughter so that one of my old plans may finally come to fruition. A few years ago, when Chelsea Clinton was looking at colleges, there was talk of her attending Amherst College. I was psyched. The plan was to meet her, date her, and marry her. That way, when Bill died I'd become President. Really, it's in the Constitution — look it up.

Chelsea broke my heart and went to Stanford. Luckily, Bill Clinton's term of office is ending without a male heir. Now they have to hold an election. I've taken care of myself not only by getting set up with one of the Gore daughters, but also by providing Dad with a can't miss campaign platform. His election and my succession are assured. All I have to do is recruit Stone Cold Steve Austin to take care of Jesse Ventura and my place in history is secure forever.

The moral of this is to be nice to your RA. Observe quiet hours and always go to their study breaks, because you never know when one of them might be in position to make you the leader of the free (for now) world.

Down on the farm

The United Farm Workers of America (UFW), American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL–CIO), has since its birth in the early 1960s under the leadership of Cesar Chavez and Dolores Huerta, galvanized the consciousness of many consumers by pointing out the direct links between the price of the vegetables and fruits we eat and the miserable working and living conditions of farm workers.

With the famous grape boycott, which began in the late 1960s, consumer action was able to force growers and the agribusiness industry to begin taking farmworker concerns into mind, no longer to be dismissed out of hand. Basic collective bargaining rights were for the first time won for agricultural laborers, most of whom were nationally oppressed non–white workers, long abused by a system of white supremacy and its associated usage of threats, intimidation, and violence to maintain a system of naked oppression.

"Old anti–labor practices such as the construction of company unions with paid stooges and enforcer–thugs are being utilized to intimidate and harass workers who wish to align with the UFW."

Colin S. Cavell

From the organization of the first union locals in the fields, the UFW went on to win victories against the mandatory use of the short–handled hoe (growers wanted their field overseers to make certain everyone was working and not standing around idle, hence the usage of a short– handle); victories for the establishment of out–houses in the fields; mandated requirements for facilities so workers could wash their hands; victories against the usage of certain carcinogenic pesticides, etc.

The hunger strikes of Cesar Chavez and the marches of both Chavez and Huerta were calls to action, to wake up the consciousness of a nation, which had plunged into the quagmire of the Vietnam War while denying non–white workers at home their basic civil and human rights.

Cesar Chavez died in 1993, though the union he founded lives on with his other co–founder Dolores Huerta and, since May of 1993, the newly elected UFW President, Arturo Rodriguez.

Initially, recruiting 10,000 new farm workers as associate union members in a program set up by Cesar Chavez, Arturo Rodriguez then led the UFW into an impressive record of fourteen straight secret–ballot elections where the UFW was chosen to represent workers in their negotiations with the growers, and which has produced over two dozen signed contracts with growers.

In recognition of the UFW's impressive record of winning representational elections and negotiating union contracts, Arturo, in October of 1995, was elected to the AFL–CIO's governing executive council. In effect, he is one of the top labor leaders in the country today.

Success has its costs, however, as now agribusiness interests in California are attempting to thwart any further UFW union organizing. Old anti–labor practices such as the construction of company unions with paid stooges and enforcer–thugs are being utilized to intimidate and harass workers who wish to align with the UFW. In an atmosphere of anti–affirmative action, farm workers who are largely of Mexican ancestry are once again threatened with the denial of their basic civil and legal rights as citizens and as workers.

And so again, the UFW, under the leadership of Arturo Rodriguez is turning to their once powerful weapon: public consciousness. In his speaking tour of the nation, UFW President Arturo Rodriguez will address the UMass community tonight in an effort to energize and motivate a new generation of activists.

A wide range of graduate and undergraduate organizations representing a variety of ethnic and political affiliations are sponsoring the lecture visit of Arturo Rodriguez to UMass. Co–sponsoring this event also are various departments on this campus and organizations in the Five College area. Arturo will be speaking at the Campus Center Auditorium at 7 p.m. tonight. Let us not disappoint him or the farm workers in their struggles. Let us stand in solidarity with the farm workers and declare: Si, se puede (Yes it can be done!).

One Acts lift the Curtain

Performances save lack of framework

By Timothy Matos

AN EVENING OF ONE ACTS
Curtain Theater
Nov. 7

The UMass Theater Department's Evening of One Acts was full of vitality and vigor, but lacked a powerful frame that would justify doing plays by Christopher Durang and Evelina Fernandez in the same night. Although the individual works share thematic similarities, their positioning seemed arbitrary and careless. It would have made more sense to open up the night with Durang's Mrs. Sorkin instead of Fernandez's How Am I Supposed to Know I'm Still Alive.

Mrs. Sorkin works as a kind of prologue to the world of Durang, and provides a limited context for the world of modern theater. Denise Wagner, as the daring monologuist Mrs. Sorkin, was charming and hilarious. She handled Durang's nervous and incoherent ramblings admirably, and deserved to open up the evening. However, I am not sure that this change would have solved all problems. Fernandez's play sticks out in the line up. Durang's severe style overwhelms Fernandez's funny but quieter dialogue. The night seemed to be divided into two very distinct and only faintly related segments.

Isolating the individual pieces reveals an excitement that borders on virtue. How Am I Supposed to Know I'm Still Alive probes the inner tubing of sex, marriage and old age. These are also favorite topics of Durang's. It is the overwhelming amount of connection, real contact, between Fernandez's characters that makes her play wholly foreign and distant from Durang's vision of relationships. Durang's characters are completely isolated — contact is accidental.

Medea Maraia (Angie) played a great straight man to Lisa Hori–Garcia's (Nellie) comic stylings. Both women had a great sense of when they were supposed to be joking and when they were supposed to be serious. The director's (Jenny Werner) decision to cast native speakers of Spanish was vital in maintaining the true flavor of the script which was laden with Spanish phrases.

Naomi in the Living Room showcased three new faces to the department stage. Karen Bordeau's Carol Brunette–like antics worked well for the psychotic Naomi. Her energy was unfaltering and a great contrast to her placid son, Jason Czernick, whose facial expressions rang louder than any of his dialogue. The sexualized, bordering on violent, relationship between a mother and son (a favorite construction of Durang's) was especially pronounced and powerful. Director Tim Mahoney made some daring choices in casting and staging which go easily unnoticed. The true art of the director lies in making everything look and feel spontaneous and natural. It is obvious that Mahoney excels at making his stage come to life.

For Whom the Southern Belle Tolls was the highlight of the night. A variation on Tennessee Williams' The Glass Menagerie, Durang continues Williams' probe of the faded and obsolete traditions of the polite South, sexuality, and emotionally fragile beings. Yet, he manages to create a text wholly his own. Durang's language is as deeply sexualized as Williams', but it is darker, more perverse. The audience greatly enjoyed the sprinkling of Menagerie lines throughout the piece — the most memorable being, "Go then! Go to the moon — you selfish dreamer." Christopher Cook and Cassandra Carroll put in exemplary performances. Carroll's louder than life deafness, and Cook's exaggerated ailments added some needed freshness to Durang's repertoire of characters.

The evening was a success on the whole, or more appropriately, on the particular. The audience was never short on laughs or enjoyment. Durang's plays are cries for consistency, and at the very least, he would have been proud of the dauntless actors who made the evening worthwhile.

Sholin's Triumph of the "Gods"

So many products of this saturated, over–populated, highly stimulated world of hip–hop are forced to tightrope the fine line that divides art and commerce. Wherein, many musicians and businessmen are separated and few are able to achieve a balance of both. In my last installment, I paid homage to the "less–acknowledged" sound providers of the subterrain. I also affirmed that a thriving culture exists far below the spotlight of commercial media. However, although business (which springs from record sales) has not popularized these "underground" artists, the majority of them crave the recognition they are not receiving.

Enter that clan from Sholin. Never have we seen such a balance of consistent quality and superstar status. Say what you will about their blockbuster image, Wu–Tang is hip–hops top group hands down. [illegible] pound for pound, beat for beat, rhyme for rhyme.

David Katzoff

Since their veritable hip–hop resurrection in 1993 with the classic Enter the Wu', they have followed with six full– length albums, all measuring up to impeccable standards. Although their styles have changed to appeal to a broader audience, their music has remained fresh and innovative. (Did you really expect Ghostface to wear that stocking on his head all these years?)

Even with the Grammy recognition, the pop–star personas, the wack MTV videos and horrendous live shows, Wu–Tang has not let their success affect their abilities in the studio. All nine members have unique lyrical prowess, and with the incomparable production of Prince Rakeem, Wu resides at the pinnacle of the hip–hop universe.

As we patiently await new installments from the Clan, let us take a quick profile at each of its members:

- The RZA is, of course, the head and backbone of the family. He is the beat provider with an ill speech impediment and scientific flow. They form like Voltron behind him.
- Meth, a.k.a. Johny Blaze, is the character actor, the shape shifter, the lady killer and rhyme author with a most venomous pen. You may feel the urge to knock Meth's "commercial" tendencies, but never question his writing skills.
- Ghostface is perhaps Wu's greatest MC. His raw voice and patented delivery keeps him versatile but never off point. He exemplifies both sensitivity and flamboyance.
- Raekwon is the abstract lyricist. His verbal Picasso's often take us to new auditory dimensions and require repeated listening to comprehend. He is the vital core of Wu's intelligence and universal appeal.
- U–God is the methodical MC. He has the ability to explode on a verse or simply deliver his rhyme with hard– edged delicacy. He adds to the assault with his poisonous lyricism and calm aura.
- O.D.B is truly the bastard of the family. With his drunken studio rants, he has created some of raps oddest styles and boisterous songs. When his intoxicated thoughts are flowing freely he is often undisciplined but live nonetheless.
- Genius is perhaps the most consistent member. You can always count on him for a dope verse. Although his lyrics are seldom spellbinding, his confidence on the mic

it

The Office of Information Technologies, Network Systems and Services unit, announces the immediate availability of a new high speed dial-up service for off-campus use. The new 56K service will support PPP access only and will require a valid OIT (UMAccess) account for authentication. The high-speed service may be reached by dialing 577-5600 and will support the v.90 and K56Flex protocols. More detail about the types of protocols supported, expected connection speeds and references to modem manufacturer resources may be found at http://www-nss.oit.umass.edu/oit/nss/services/umaccess/56k. Please send questions and/or problem reports about campus dial-up access to modem-admin@nic.umass.edu or to the OIT helpdesk at 545-9400.

OIT continues to provide the 33K service for off-campus access at 545-3700 as well as the recently announced express connect service at 577-4100. The express connect service has a session limit of eight minutes and is intended for short duration applications such as checking e-mail.

While OIT proceeds to add services and capacity to dial-up services, it is clear there may continue to be times when lines are busy and it is difficult to connect. We remind you that the dial-up services are a shared and limited resource. Please do not abuse them by engaging in "camping" or staying connected while not using the line. This practice only makes a busy service worse. OIT recently upgraded the campus Internet capacity by 50%, which should reduce the time necessary to complete an on-line query to Internet resources.

Indie success at Noho film fest

By Rob Roensch, Kevin Monahan and Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

The day after the Northampton Film Festival is like the day after Christmas. You wish it would never end. Once again, the film festival descended on the valley and showered us with treats. For one weekend, Northampton was bursting at the seams with small, personal movies that thumbed their noses at the almighty power of Hollywood, preferring to tell stories on their own terms.

The festival proved to be enlightening and inspiring for the local fledgling filmmaker. It broadened the horizons of what can be done by a student with a Bolex. Like any other event, the film festival had its artistic highs and lows, from a sublime avant-garde piece that colorized a black-and-white song-and-dance number with psychedelic, overwhelming color to a family-TV-dramaish tale of a hot-shot photographer's friendship with a cranky, wise old woman.

The festival was packed full of highlights. Here are some of them:

ONE SELF: FISH/GIRL
Directed by Emily Hubley
Nov. 6

This animated piece delved into the mind of a confused woman coming of age. Most of the animation consisted of delicate colored lines in the shape of stick figures. However, it was not simply a cartoon. The lines morphed unpredictably into animals, designs, and objects. The smooth, unbroken feel of the animation combined with the quiet, monotone overlapping dialogue gave the piece the feel of a dream, or, more specifically, of being inside someone else's dream.

THE SNOW FIELD
Directed by Peter Coston
Nov. 6

This short about war and faith was shot completely in black and white, with a minimum of special effects. The movie has a stark, patient beauty, making wonderful use of simple things like landscape and the intricacies of people's faces that more expensively made movies frequently ignore. The film has moral weight, a very strongly stated sense of place, and unforgettable images. Even more impressively, it only needed less than twenty minutes to tell its story.

PHIL TOUCHES FLO
Directed by David Birdsell
Nov. 6

An audience favorite, this entertaining comedic short follows the adventures of a goofy looking dog, a goofy looking man who touches the goofy looking dog, and the goofy looking dog's overprotective, goofy looking owner who carries a stun gun. Hijinks ensue. The short is a parody of Westerns, and was cast by the same people who cast the "X-files," which explains the weird people.

CONDITIONAL LOVE
Directed by Ardele Lister
Nov. 7

What does it mean to be Canadian? With dry, biting wit and ominous concern, this documentary explores Canada's identity, or rather, lack of identity. As director Lister said after the film, "It's so much easier to say what [being Canadian] isn't rather than what it is."

Using archival footage from the '40s through the '70s, and interviews with Canadian residents as well as journalist Robert MacNeil, Lister satirizes and explores Canada's passive attitude toward their identity. Pressured by both American ideals and the frigid climate, they are struggling for a voice, and their future remains uncertain. Asked what that future is, one Canadian, in a restaurant, replies, "Can I have another question?"

GROUND ZERO/SACRED GROUND
Directed by Karen Aqua
Nov. 7

In less than 10 minutes, this animated film explores the evil of man's manipulation of nature. Thirty-five miles from an ancient Native American rock art site lies the area where the U.S. first tested their atomic bomb. Using hand drawn animation at 12 drawings per second, the film explores these two very different worlds colliding. A shocking artistic interpretation of the death of natural art.

HAVE YOU SEEN PATSY WAYNE?
Directed by Todd Korgan
Nov. 8

An absurdly comical short about a mildly insane woman who believes she is the love child of Patsy Cline and John Wayne. Patsy Wayne spends her life trying to prove her ancestry (mostly to waitresses at diners) and collecting disability benefits because she is "spontaneously orgasmic." Jamie Tolbert wrote and starred in the seven minute clip based on her stand up routine.

DIRECTOR'S MEDIUM
Directed by Andrew Sterling
Nov. 8

Shot on video, Director Sterling presents us with a sardonic look at principles and techniques of filmmaking. The diatribe consists of an overly opinionated film student disagreeing with his guardian angel.

SLAVES OF HOLLYWOOD
Directed by Terry Keefe and Michael Wechsler
Nov. 8

Much more bitter and cynical than Robert Altman's The Player could ever allow itself to be. It is the story of a studio head's daughter and her struggle to make a documentary about the entry level workers in tinseltown entitled, you guessed it, Slaves of Hollywood (could we get any more self conscious here?). Co-director Terry Keefe was present at the screening and gave some insight on the sarcastic tone of the film. "I've been fairly sarcastic since I was about five years old... I was working for a bunch of producers at Orion and very much in that sub-culture. There's a whole sub-culture of assistants to powerful people in Hollywood who are all trying to be mini-moguls... This was very much my life at the time, I was cynical but I think I'm less now."

Keefe describes reactions to Slaves in Hollywood as very good for the most part, "It plays a lot better with the industry in New York. It screens fine in L.A. actually, because nobody wants to believe that that's them... But people in Hollywood still want to see a movie about their lives." When asked about his feelings on film school, Keefe replied, "I don't think it's that important. As an undergraduate you have to major in something. If you're in film school as an undergraduate that's fine, but if you're going on to two years of graduate school, I'd spent the money on a business degree, just to be able to make money to make films."

"Some people have done great with film school. It just depends on whether you want to be in that environment, it's a very structured, fairly political environment. It depends on where you go. USC was very structured — if it was a looser environment I would have enjoyed film school more. For the amount of money you put into film school, you can take that money, make a film, and learn just as much by the making of that film."

THE TYRANT
Directed by Nathon Ford
Nov. 8

Also on video, this one tells the story of a man who has a rat living in his head. Excellent visuals highlighted this short from Northampton filmmaker and Hampshire College graduate Nathan Ford.

NEXT TIME
Directed by Alan Fraser
Nov. 8

The story of a white boy living in South Central Los Angeles, who befriends an older, black woman in a Laundromat. There is little action or technique displayed in this dialogue driven film, and most of the film takes place in the laundromat. However, fine acting and important racial issues keep the film from being all talk.

OUT OF THE PAST
Directed by Jeff Dupre
Nov. 8

At first glance this film might reek of self-importance, but don't make that judgment too soon. Director Jeff Dupree chronicles the plight of then high school senior Kelli Peterson and her attempts to start a Gay/Lesbian/Bisexual support group at her Utah high school. The film goes on to tell the story of several gay and lesbian figures through history, such as Michael Wigglesworth (Puritan writer), Sarah Orne Jewett and Annie Fields (Boston writers), Henry Gerber (founder of the first American Gay rights organization in Chicago), Bayard Rustin (architect of the Civil Rights Movement and advisor to Martin Luther King, Jr.) and Barbara Gittings (contemporary lesbian activist).

The film intercuts between Kelli's fight, and historical stories. What looks to be a dull, self-indulgent history lesson on the surface turns out to be a well crafted and very important film. Although Out of the Past ends in triumph for Kelli and her "Gay/Straight Alliance," the film is dated. Today the Utah school system has voted once again to ban all non-academic organizations (which ironically includes a Bible club) from Utah public schools in order to eliminate the Gay/Straight Alliance.

GODS AND MONSTERS
Special to the Festival

Those who stayed to see the special sneak preview of Gods and Monsters were not disappointed. The story of director James Whale, also known as "the father of Frankenstein," managed to be gripping, funny and poignant. Ian McKellan is terrific as Whale, and Brendan Frasier does an adequate job as Clay, the ex-Marine gardener. Lynn Redgrave steals the show as Whale's overprotective maid.

Nishat Khan composed and performed Meeting of Angels, sponsored by the Asian Dance & Music Program

Gregorian chants from Indian composer Khan

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

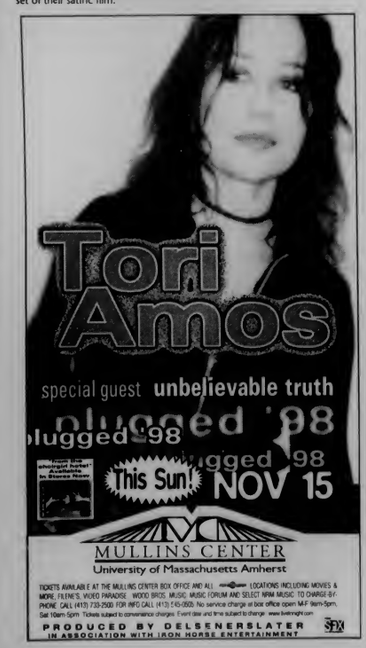
Transcending religion, culture and time, Meeting of Angels: Nishat Khan, Sitar and Gregorian Voices enlightened audiences Sunday night with a truly unique experience. The program was presented by The Asian Dance & Music Program at the University of Massachusetts.

Meeting of Angels is a performance of timeless Gregorian chants for which Khan composed Indian Raag music as accompaniment. In fact, Gregorian Chant is said to have developed from the ancient Indian Raag.

Nishat Khan is an internationally renowned sitar virtuoso whose talent is the result of eight generations of Indian classical musicians. He has toured internationally for over 20 years and has shared the stage with Ray Charles, Luciano Pavarotti, Philip Glass, and John MacLaughlin, among others. He has composed music for many films, including Bernardo Bertolucci's Little Buddha.

Gregorian Voices comprises four talented vocalists whose repertoire ranges from early music, to opera and jazz. Founder and director Jeffrey Johnson sings baritone. Daniel Clark sings tenor, Ruth Cunningham sings soprano, and Alexandra Sweeton sings mezzo-soprano.

The purpose of placing two ancient genres in dialogue is "above all to touch the soul and the inner essence of being, to search and practice that spirituality to convey aesthetically, beyond cultural, social or religious boundaries, to communicate in 'oneness,'" said Khan.



Khan exhibits this depth through his intense playing of the sitar. The sitar, in western terms sounds somewhat like a mixture of the harp, the banjo, and the harpsichord, if one can imagine such an instrument. In any case, Khan played the sitar with unbelievable dexterity and finesse, conjuring up spiritual elements from this ancient cultural tradition.

While Khan sat cross-legged on the floor, the members of Gregorian Voices, dressed in traditional concert black, sat in four chairs on the other side of the stage. These two seemingly divided platforms, east and west, were joined by the commonality of their music.

One, among many memorable pieces was called by Khan, "Raindrops in the Cathedral." Khan began playing whole tones on the sitar, which seemed to mimic the sound of raindrops hitting the ground. The sitar music was highlighted by the harmonious blend of the two female voices.

The final piece, "Offertorium Domine, in auxilium meum," featured all of the four vocalists. The subtle vocalizations of the four singers, along with the sustained vibrato of the sitar, transformed the audience into a pleasurable meditative state. All of the musical elements seemed to meld perfectly, no one was too overbearing or distracting from the others.

Meeting of Angels best explained by music producer Matteo Silva, is an encounter, "between two cultures of the highest spirituality, revealing intense secret affinities as in an ecumenical rite: based on respectful dialogue, alien to all intention of conversion. Great music proves to be indifferent to dogma...and able to present us some moments of eternity, of transcendent truth."

makes him fierce and charismatic.

• Masta Killa can't often be mistook for the GZA. His voice and rhyme execution are comparable, however his skills are nearly eclipsed by the other members on his staff. (Sort of like "El Duque" and Yankee pitching.)

• Lastly, Inspectah Deck is perhaps hip-hop's most underrated MC. Since the very beginning when he blessed us on "Protect Ya Neck," the Rebel INS has provided our ears with complex concepts and gruff clarity. Over the years his style has gone unchanged while he has lurked in the shadows of Wu's infamous fame. After recent up-staging guest appearances on Gangstarr, Killah Priest, Funk Flex and Pete Rock, Deck is fully prepared to unleash his own album, no holes barred.

As we approach the dawn of new projects from at least three of the aforementioned Clansmen, we can only expect similar dominance. And while the "underground" is providing an array of quality sounds, we turn to hip-hops most affluent for the next wave of excellence. Stay tuned...

Manchester powers men's squad, Gerasimova anchors UM women

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

In the final event of the 1998 fall season, the Massachusetts men's tennis team competed in the ITA Eastern Championship Tournament yesterday in Princeton, N.J.

Junior star Rob Manchester led the way for the Minutemen, advancing into the second round of the singles competition. In his opening match, the Attleboro, Mass. native edged Colgate's Brian Boyle 6-4, 7-6 in a first-round nailbiter. He then advanced to the second round, where he was topped 6-2, 6-1 by the No. 13 seed Erich Holzer of Dartmouth.

After partaking in singles play, Manchester then joined teammate Bo Navarro for the double's tournament. Despite a gritty effort, the pair was defeated 8-4 by Brown stars Phil Cheung and Chris Wolfe.

As one of the regular singles stars on the men's squad, Manchester compiled a 4-10 mark during the fall portion of the season, competing in every event. His Minutemen compiled a 4-3 team mark overall, with solid showings from senior Todd Cheney (7-3 singles, 5-3 doubles) and sophomore Fabian Rabaral (8-5 singles, 1-1 doubles).

As a result of its three-month winter absence, the team will not return to action until February 12-14, when UMass travels to Ithaca, N.Y. for the Cornell Invitational.

Women's tennis

The Minutewomen also competed in the ITA Eastern Regional Championship Tournament this weekend in Philadelphia with junior Ola Gerasimova leading the way for her team. The Greenfield, Mass. native advanced all the way to the quarterfinals, where she was topped by Richmond's Janelle Williams 7-6, 6-0.

Gerasimova (9-6 singles, 8-2 doubles during the regular season) was able to reach the field of the final eight after receiving a bye in the opening round, and then defeating Jodie Hurley 6-2, 6-3 in the second round. She also took part in the doubles competition, pairing with fellow Minutewoman Helana Horak during the opening round.

With the fall season now finished, UMass will enjoy a three-month hiatus, and next return to competition on February 5 for the Cornell Invitational.

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You can have more than expected today, but you must take care that you do not go about attaining it in an overly aggressive manner.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Something you do or say today is likely to attract a good deal of attention, with its fair share of praise and criticism. Reconsider this stance.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Why change course today when your current activities have been paying off and serving you well in a number of unexpected ways? Don't be a fool for change.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Others are looking to you for motivation and inspiration today. However, it may be time for you to look for the same timely enlightenment.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — The most important thing right now is not the "bottom line." There is more to life than money. What is most important is your sense of self.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — A collective effort can pay off handsomely today, and you must do what you can to ease tensions as the work begins. Your mood may be surprising.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You're going to have to buckle down and tend to one or two duties which bring with them unusual challenges. Let ideas flow freely today.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You need to get the message across. Be clear, direct, and streamlined in your approach to all things today. Don't invite confusion.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You want to create something that lasts, and today you're likely to come up with an idea whose time has most definitely come. Go for it!

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — There's no reason for you to think that your new ideas won't be accepted by the "powers that be." It all depends on how you "sell" yourself.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You're going to have to work well with those who are on the "cutting edge" today. In this way, you can do something that hasn't been done before.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Your ability to work well with others comes in handy today. You can expect the possibility that many people will seek you out in the days and weeks to come.

Minutewomen finish season at 10–11, will look to rebound in 1999

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

When reflecting back on the 1998 season of the Massachusetts women's soccer team, there will be two ways to interpret the 10–11 campaign that the Minutewomen endured.

For the more casual observer, the thing that will stand out will be the record. It was the first losing season in the history of the UMass program, and is not representative of the storied tradition of that the Minutewomen seek to uphold every time they take to the field.

The soccer purist, on the other hand, will realize the struggle that the 1998 campaign really was for UMass. When you combine season ending injuries to four starters — one of the nation's toughest schedules — and a juggling of players into new positions, you almost have to wonder how the Minutewomen were able to persevere through all the adversity and make the Atlantic 10 tournament.

Midfielder Tarah Tokarchik capped off her junior season by being named to the Atlantic–10 All Tournament team.

"People will look at 1998 in general and say, '10–11, what a bad year,'" UMass women's soccer Jim Rudy said. "But I can say that it wasn't. This team did a lot of things of great value. I was disappointed with the win/loss record, but not with the team. They're a hard-working, happy, easy to enjoy team, and I liked them a lot."

Despite all of that adversity, UMass did reach post–season play before falling to Dayton 1–0 on Friday afternoon in the semifinals of the A–10 tourney.

"I was totally pleased with the effort [against Dayton]. I felt that we outplayed them by more than just a little," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "We survived their defensive tactics: the grabs, the holds and the physical challenges. Our defenders defended well and gave up the minimum number of chances, and our front people targeted and connected very well. The only part that was missing was the finishing."

The game remained scoreless until late in the second half, when Dayton's Danielle Gillespie found the back of the net for the only goal of the game.

"There was a fluky loss of possession in the midfield and Tara Albert [who tried to take out Sophie Lecot earlier in the game with a dangerous tackle] picked up a loose ball and caught our defense in transition," said Rudy describing the game–winning goal. "She played a nice 15–yard ball to Gillespie, another one of their subs, and she buried a shot right over Angie's [Napoli] head."

Dayton coach Mike Tucker continued to employ frequent substitutions throughout the whole game, as was expected by Rudy and the Minutewomen.

"They made seven subs in the final 10 minutes. I thought that opened it up for us to get back in the game," Rudy said. "We had some really good chances all game to tie it, but we either shanked the shot, or the last pass was a little too far or the last cross was too high. We went out fighting down to the buzzer."

And the fighting power truly was what this team was all about, not just on Friday, but all season long.

"Every training session was good. This team trained and worked hard every time out there," Rudy said. "There wasn't one game that I can say that they didn't give the maximum effort. Not many coaches can say that."

"Despite all of the adversities we stayed together as a team very well," added Rudy. "There was no finger pointing or blaming. We had some people show great courage by playing in totally foreign positions, thrown into the fire with no preparation at all. And by the end of the year they were pretty good."

Even though the NCAA Tournament will go on without the Minutewomen for the first time since 1990, the hopes are high for the 1999 UMass squad. The Minutewomen will lose only seniors Sophie Lecot and Amanda Thompson, and while the departure of those two players leaves a couple of holes that need to be filled, injured players Robin Smith, Brooke Bartlett, Martha Conover and Kate Webb will be back next fall along with a new freshman class.

"The 1999 season started on Friday at about 7:15 p.m. It's going to be an interesting dynamic next year," Rudy said. "We have some returning people who started this year in measure by default to injuries, and we have people coming back from rehab who will be at various stages of fitness and confidence. Then we'll have some new kids who will have an impact."

But whatever the situation may be, 1998 will be a year that the Minutewomen will want to use as a learning experience and as a catapult back onto the winning track.

"I don't want to be put in this position again, and I don't think that we will be," Rudy said.

In the end, the past three months were the exception to the rule that is the storied tradition of the Massachusetts women's soccer program. September of 1999 will be here soon enough, and one thing is for sure: Rudy and the Minutewomen won't be looking for a repeat performance.

That's not good news for the rest of the Atlantic 10.

Minutewomen Notes: Now that the season has come to a close, post–season honors are being handed out. At the A–10 banquet last Thursday, Lecot was named Conference Player of the Year, while Thompson, Emma Kurowski and Kara Green were also first–team picks. Lecot and Tarah Tokarchik were also named to the All–Tournament team.

With A–10 championship at UM, the field hockey team plays on

By Aaron Saykin

After securing its third consecutive Atlantic 10 title in Philadelphia on Sunday, the Massachusetts field hockey team will have almost no time to catch its breath.

With only a one–day lay off for preparation and a trip to the NCAA Tournament at stake, the A–10 champion Minutewomen will play host to the Patriot League winner Holy Cross today at 2 p.m. on the friendly turf of Richard F. Garber Field.

As victors of their respective conferences, both teams have advanced to the Play–In game, whose winner will earn a berth in the national tournament. Although UMass (13–7) coach Patty Shea wouldn't mind having a bit more time to prepare for such an important game, she feels that the suddenness of the contest may help her streaking squad.

"You can't [celebrate the title], which is actually good," she said. "[The players] have to focus their attention. This is where they wanted to be. Now Tuesday becomes the time when they have to take care of business."

The Crusaders (16–4) enter the contest fresh off an upset of top–seeded Fairfield in their league tournament, where they received clutch play from goal tender Maigrd Salley, who made seven saves to secure the victory. The Minutewomen must also contend with the recent Holy Cross scoring threat, Ali Roberts, who was named Patriot League Tournament MVP after scoring both goals in the final 2–1 win over the No. 1 ranked Fairfield.

"They have a strong team, and this is the second–year in a row that they've won the Patriot League," Shea said of her team's upcoming opponent. "They've been very, very strong within the Northeast region, and they don't have that many losses. I know that they're well coached, and I know that they come out with a lot of fire and enthusiasm."

In the midst of a hurried post–season, UMass may take relief in the fact that it will host the Play–In game — an advantage which Shea feels may help her players rest up before the season's most important match.

"It would have been tough to have gotten back on a bus and traveled again," she said. "We got home late [Sunday] night, and it was a long weekend. We played back–to–back games, and then to travel and have a one–day turnaround is tough."

In addition to the comfort which will likely accompany the home–field advantage for today's game, the five Minutewomen seniors may utilize another intangible to stymie the Crusaders. As they prepare for their final contest in front of the Amherst faithful, Vicky Browne, Erica Johnston, Kate Putnam, Laura Phelan, and Kerry Lyons will be on center stage today, hoping to bid their farewell to UMass with no regrets.

"I think it's great because they know it's going to be their last game, and the emotion is going to be there." Shea said of her fab five. "It's the last hurrah for the seniors, and what better way [is there] to have your home field, than by winning a game to send your team into the NCAA Tournament?"

Volleyball splits two big matches; UMass downs Rams, falls to GW

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

If a 3–0 win over Fordham on Friday night was a step forward for the Massachusetts volleyball team, then a 3–1 loss to George Washington on Saturday night at Curry Hicks Cage was definitely a step back.

The four set loss at the hands of the Colonials dropped the Minutewomen to 12–14 overall, 9–7 in the Atlantic 10, and severely dampened their hopes for a berth in the A–10 tournament to be held in Pittsburgh on Nov. 27.

"This loss really knocks us out [of making the tournament]," Massachusetts volleyball coach Bonnie Kenny said. "It looks like Dayton, Xavier, Virginia Tech and Temple are going to be the four teams. After that it's URI, George Washington and us, and we're all in the same boat."

After dropping the first two sets by identical 15–11 scores, UMass came out fired up in the third frame and disposed of GW 15–8. The intensity was there for the beginning of the fourth set as well, as the Minutewomen took a commanding 10–4 lead. However, GW stormed back to roll off eight consecutive points and pull away for a 15–12 win of both the set and match.

"We just stopped passing the ball," Kenny said. "Number 11 [Stephanie Fike] had seven points in a row, and that hurt us. You can't do that."

"I thought that we played hard, but we just couldn't get into our flow offensively," continued Kenny. "They kept coming at us and we just got beat at the net."

Kari Hogancamp led the way for UMass with a double–double, notching 15 kills and 20 digs. Jill Meyers also had a double–double during the night with 15 kills and 12 digs. Heather Holtsberg had 43 assists for the Minutewomen in the losing effort.

On Friday night, UMass easily took care of the Rams in three sets, a much different outcome than a five–set affair earlier in the season in the Bronx. The Minutewomen won by a 15–13, 15–4, 15–7 final over Fordham.

"We played very well and hit the ball extremely well," Kenny said. "When we play well we are capable of beating any team. The emotional level tonight was as good as in the Temple match, but I think that we played even better tonight [than against Temple]."

Fordham hung around in the first set, but the Minutewomen took care of business after that. Hogancamp once again had a double–double for UMass, tallying 10 kills and 13 digs, while Holtsberg added 41 assists.

UMass will now need to run the table in its final four matches of the year and get some help elsewhere if they want to end up in the Steel City at the end of the month. The first step, however, will be on Wednesday night when the Minutewomen host Rhode Island.

"We're going to have to re–establish our goals," Kenny said. "We're two games under .500 now, and we'd like to finish above .500."

After Wednesday's match, UMass will host St. Bonaventure on Friday before heading west to Ohio next weekend for a pair with A–10 leaders Dayton and Xavier.

Bruiser's boys prepare for regular season

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

As much as players like Lari Ketner and Anthony Oates must love ramming into each other for three hours of practice, scrimmaging against one another can get old and boring.

That's why Massachusetts men's basketball head coach Bruiser Flint likes the pre–season games, such as the one his Minutemen will partake in tomorrow night, when the William D. Mullins Center hosts the Marathon Oil team at 7 p.m. Although Ketner and Oates are expected to do their fair share of bumping below the hoop in this contest, at least they'll get to do it against somebody else.

"This is really a good time to practice for us," said Flint of the preseason, who feels that a game situation will offer a break from the monotony of practice, as well as an opportunity for the fans to catch a sneak preview of their 23rd–ranked (ESPN/USA Today) Minutemen. "After a while, you get stale playing against yourselves, and you need some other people to come in and see what you're doing."

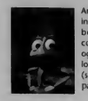
After his team edged Team Fokus 84–82 in its opening preseason contest last Thursday, Flint had his first opportunity to watch and evaluate players such as Rafael Cruz and Ajmal Basit, who were the top UMass scorers and bright spots in the victory. Although last season's performances and this year's practice sessions may give Flint an idea of his rotation for the regular season, he feels that the preseason may determine the playing time of the players whose status remains uncertain.

"What it really gives you, from a coach's standpoint, is a look at what [certain] guys will do for you in game situations," he said. "You want to see guys that you regularly haven't seen in game situations. Also you want to see how much improvement a guy has made from one season to another. That's what you look for in the preseason, and sometimes you sacrifice the win for that."

Among the many experiments Flint will attempt to conduct during the Marathon Oil game will be the implementation of an up–tempo offense. Although the scheme seemed hurried at times during the first exhibition game, the third–year coach knows that the initial uneasiness and fast–pace will only be a minor and correctable kink in his challenge to make the offense more exciting and effective.

"I think it's more of an opening up of what we do, than [it is] playing fast, and because we're opening up, we play a little faster. That's the difference."

Minutemen Notes: In an effort to spread the excitement surrounding the new fast pace of the No. 23 Minutemen, Flint and his players will be signing autographs and talking with fans from 12 to 1:30 p.m. on Thursday in The Hatch, which is located on the lower floor of the Student Union.



As a result of the large crowd at Midnight Madness, as well as his team's accessibility to the rest of the campus, Flint feels that student and fan involvement may reach an all–time high during the 1998–1999 campaign.

Russians trying to stablize financially

MOSCOW (AP) — The Russian government is trying to keep a tight lid on spending and won't print large sums of money to pay debts, Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov said yesterday.

"We guarantee payments of current wages," he said at a meeting with lawmakers. "We can and will do that without printing new money.

"We have hardly printed any money so far, but we have huge debts," Primakov said without elaboration.

Primakov acknowledged that the government is short of funds to pay off all pensions and social subsidies for families with children.

At the same time, Primakov indicated the government may print up to 25 billion rubles, worth $1.7 billion, saying that wouldn't fuel high inflation.

Primakov claimed the International Monetary Fund wouldn't oppose money printing as long as it didn't exceed that amount. When other Russian officials made similar claims in recent weeks, the IMF denied that, saying it's against issuing new money that could stoke high inflation.

8–year–old's body found in boy's bed

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. (AP) — A teen–ager told police he was beating an 8–year–old girl in his bedroom when his father came home, so he stepped out his room for a bit, then returned to kill her.

The body of Maddie Clifton was entombed for a week in the frame of the same waterbed where 14–year–old Joshua Earl Patrick Phillips slept. It was discovered by the boy's mother when it began to give off an odor.

Yesterday, the boy was ordered held at a juvenile detention center until his trial. He is charged with murder, but because of his age will not face the death penalty.

Maddie disappeared while chipping golf balls with friends in her neighborhood. Police said Joshua stabbed her nine times in the body and twice in the neck in his bedroom, and hit her in the head with a baseball bat.

Joshua "came out so his father wouldn't go into his room, and he continued to hear some movement from her, some sounds from her, and after he got clear of his father he went back and somewhat finished the job," Sheriff Nat Glover told NBC's "Today" show and WTLV in Jacksonville.

Local vets recall horrors of war as they educate & celebrate Veterans' Day

By Aimee Wallis
Collegian Correspondent

On Tuesday evening, the Amherst–Pelham Regional Middle School and the Amherst–Pelham Regional High School co–sponsored a Veterans Day Commemoration.

The event entitled, "Understanding Private Ryan," was conducted by The Veterans Education Project (VEP).

Five to 10 World War II veterans rounded out the attendance of students, parents, grandparents and faculty at the middle school auditorium.

The agenda for the evening consisted of a brief flashback from each of the four veterans of war, followed by an audience participation question and answer session.

Moderator Steven Sossaman, VEP training coordinator, introduced each veteran beginning with John Tenanes, a Private First Class in the U.S. Army serving at the D–day landing on Omaha Beach.

Tenanes retold a story of an invasion of German soldiers opening fire at daybreak on his platoon's truck.

He said many of his army's trucks were on board a ramp when water began to rise through the floor boards. Tenanes's was the only one to escape, leaving the ramp and trucks on top of it to sink.

Tenanes had difficulty speaking of the invasion and commented on the effect it has had on him.

"I have had more flashbacks in the past few weeks organizing my speech here, than I have had in that past 54 years," Tenanes said.

The second panelist, Paul Slater, a motor machinist mate first class for the U.S. Navy, told his story as a member of an inexperienced team of 189 people aboard a light ship called the destroyer escort.

Slater spoke of his fear that he shared with his crew members that at any time one torpedo could blow his "tin can" of a ship to pieces. Slater believes that he survived thanks to a lot of luck and a well made ship.

Sergeant David Cohen served with the U.S. Army and worked with the liberation of Nazi concentration camps.

He described the sickness he felt when he saw the inside of the camps.

"What I saw was beyond description... masses of dead bodies were lying around. I was forced to look at a gas chamber and the following day our platoon was forced to look at it again under the orders of Eisenhower and General Patton," Cohen said.

Another part of the horror he saw was a small shed that contained lamp shades made of human skin.

The final panelist was a younger veteran, Corporal Gordon Howell, who served with the U.S. Marine Corps and shared his stories as a radio operator.

Howell said he enjoys sharing his experiences of war as a way to teach children about violence and help them to understand why violence occurs. Howell relates to children his stores of war and explains what violence can do to a person.

"After you experience war your mind turns into a mental armor, not allowing a person to love or trust anyone, leaving a person with anger," Howell said.

The program ended with a question and answer session between the panelists and the audience.

One question addressed the realism of the movie, "Saving Private Ryan."

"Strictly infantry work was shown in the movie," Tenanes said.

Besides this comment, the men on the panel found the movie too similar to the "hell" they fought it.

A second question addressed how the veterans stay rational in combat.

"Survival. You want to live. You want to help the friend next to you. If you fall he may get killed," Cohen said.

This living history program is part of three that the VEP has developed. A second program is titled, "Understanding Violence," which is geared towards young people who have been affected by violence.

The Women's Project is the third and newest program added, involving women vets or the women who have had family members serve in war.

The VEP is developing a national curriculum that will be available next year and last year received the New American Community Award.

The VEP is a non–profit organization consisting of volunteer veterans of war and their family members.

The group was created 16 years ago when a few veterans came forth and voiced their concerns of the way high school students were being educated about the military. Today the group volunteers its time speaking about personal war experiences at school assemblies and public events.

The VEP encourages any men and women who have experiences or lessons they care to share with young people involving their relationship with war to contact VEP at 413–253–4947.

MASSPIRG urges students to help protect Alaskan land

By Natty Yagudin

Lenny Kohm, a photojournalist and environmentalist, spoke on Tuesday night at the University of Massachusetts about the need to preserve the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska.

Kohm's lecture was a part of the Arctic Action Campaign conducted by Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG).

The campaign calls for the declaration of the coastal plain of Alaska as a part of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Currently, the area is not a part of the refuge, and such a declaration will make it a nationally protected area.

The declaration would prohibit any further drilling of oil within its vicinity.

"It's a classic issue: oil versus wilderness," Kohm said. He spoke of his experiences there while being sent to photograph the area.

He told about his encounter with a grizzly bear in the wilderness.

"I realized for the first time that I may not be at the top of the food chain. I also realized that there may be not be anyone else to be able to have that experience," Kohm said.

He also lived with the Gwich'in, the native people who live on the coastal plain.

"Those people have been environmentalists for thousands of years, not because it's trendy or politically correct. It's because the earth is necessary for their survival," Kohm said.

Kohm testified in front of Congress and also traveled extensively around the country, giving lectures at universities and getting people to join his campaign.

"The hard part is to convince people that they can do something about it," Kohm said.

Kohm stressed the importance of the involvement of college students to the campaign.

"Students are willing to go out and protest. They bring a lot of energy and fresh ideas," Kohm said.

Kohm also urged students to visit Alaska in order to see what the issues are about. He stressed that the refuge is a public land which

NEWARK, N.J. — A man sought as a witness in the sniper killing of an obstetrician–gynecologist near Buffalo has been spotted in at least two locations in New Jersey, the FBI said yesterday.

James Charles Kopp now looks different than photographs distributed by authorities, FBI Special Agent Monica M. Patton said.

"The bushier beard is a recent sighting... within the past few days," Patton said.

Activists discuss Middle East crisis

By Julie Fialkow

Two peace activists, one Israeli and one Palestinian, spoke at the campus center Monday in "Roads to Reconciliation: Peacebuilding in the Middle East."

Zoughbi and Judith Green spoke about their efforts to facilitate understanding and open dialogue between Israeli and Palestinian communities.

Zoughbi, is director of the Wi'am Palestinian Conflict Resolution Center, which focuses on the building of relationships and cross–community bridges.

He has also participated in workshops through the Jerusalem Arbitration Center.

Zoughbi spoke of his belief in "arms of dialogue, rather than the dialogue of arms."

"Two million Palestinians are still besieged, and the media will not talk about it. The media will not talk about peace work," he said.

Zoughbi also said that peace activists like himself are trying to talk about social change and transformation.

"There are a lot of mistaken distorted images. Either we [Palestinians] are terrorists or fundamentalists and that's not helping," he said.

"We need to start an unlearning process; it is time to do that."

Green has spent the past nine years working to promote dialogue between Palestinians in the West Bank and Israelis. She emigrated from the United States to Israel in 1975 and founded the Rapprochement Dialogue Center, the result of a small group of Israelis and Palestinians who had met in one another's homes to gain understanding of one another.

Green also founded the Nablus–West Jerusalem Dialogue for Peace and the Abu Tor Neighborhood Dialogue Group.

She talked about what she wants to see happen in the Middle East.

"I want peace to happen not because the American government is pushing economic security, not because we want Palestinians in their own state, we want there to be a change of heart," Green said.

Green said the work peace activists like herself and Zoughbi are doing doesn't necessarily have a direct effect on policy makers.

"Whatever they decide, if people at home don't get to that point in won't matter. It can't rest on one political leader. That leader can be assassinated," she said.

"Peacebuilding in the Middle East" was one of four presentations which are a part of "Roads to Reconciliation."

The event was sponsored by UMass Office of Jewish Affairs, The Kahrun Center for Peacebuilding and Friends of Bosnia.

Both speakers are in the United States as Brandeis University International Fellows in Coexistence.

Latino labor leader speaks at UMass

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

President of the United Farm Workers, Arturo Rodriguez came to the Campus Center Auditorium on Tuesday to speak about the plight of farm workers.

Rodriguez has helped thousands of farmers around the country unionize and stand up against unfit working conditions and low wages.

The evening began with the "Farm Workers' Prayer" led by Alegra Eroy–Reveles, president of the Amherst College La Chicana/o Caucus.

Tom Juravich, director of UMass labor relations & research center, sang traditional folk songs and played the guitar to the audience of about one hundred.

Rodriguez began his speech with "Si se puede, UFW's motto meaning, "Yes, it can be done."

He congratulated the union members on campus for their solidarity and strength in numbers.

"This is one of the only campuses that I know of in the country that is wall–to–wall union," he said.

Rodriguez said that Amherst is well–known as "farmer folklore."

"Some great work has been done here," he said, explaining that during the Gallo wine and lettuce boycotts a few years ago, Amherst was instrumental in western Massachusetts strong showing of support.

"The faculty, staff and students were all very much behind us," he said.

Rodriguez showed a filmstrip which illustrated the farm workers movement and the powerful resistance against unionization that has occurred in states like California.

Arturo Rodrdiguez spoke at the Campus Center Tuesday evening.

He spoke about a mushroom farm in Florida, Quincy Farms, which is the largest mushroom grower in the Southeastern part of the country.

"Harvesting of mushrooms takes place in huge hut houses which are dark and humid. They plant the mushrooms on beds and have to straddle the beds and stack them up.

"By the time the tob bed is stacked they are 12 feet off the ground straddling the tray. They move fast and often fall and slip off," he said.

Rodriguez explained that the company would not take care of the workers once they fell and eventually they would be forced out of their jobs. In 1995, Quincy farm workers protested during their lunch hours and were met with threats from owners.

Many lost their jobs and 25 were arrested. If workers unionize, it will be the first union in Florida.

"We got Pizza Hut to stop buying Quincy Farms mushrooms. Now Quincy has come to table to try to moderate and agreement that would bring back 80 workers," he said.

"They will be able to hold their heads up high with dignity."

Rodriguez told the audience what they can do in their own lives to help.

"Stop 'n Shop and Bread and Circus, we know they sell Driscoll strawberries," he said. The Driscoll company has had a history of poor working conditions.

"Call managers and send a strong message so next time they are about to sign a contract with Driscoll, they will think twice over who will supply their strawberries. We can't win this fight without the support of the consumer."

northern New Jersey, she said.

Police in Red Bank were unaware of Kopp's presence in the area. "It's news to me," Lt. Aurelio Ramos said Wednesday evening. Kopp is wanted on a federal material witness warrant in the Oct. 23 shooting of Dr. Barnett Slepian of Amherst, N.Y.

Patton said she could not give specifics about when or where Kopp was sighted.

"We have received dozens of investigative leads through interviews conducted by FBI agents," Patton said.

"Mr. Kopp appears to be very transient in nature, so we don't have him linked for any period of time with any individual," she said.

He appears to be driving his 1987 black Chevrolet Cavalier with Vermont tags, Patton said.

The material witness warrant was based on reports that the car was spotted in Amherst, N.Y. in the weeks before the 52-year-old abortion provider was killed.

Investigators believe the Slepian killing is linked to four earlier non-fatal shootings targeting doctors in Canada and the United States.

"Mr. Kopp appears to be very transient in nature, so we don't have him linked for any period of time with any individual," she said.

Cape Cod water threatened by Nat'l Guard war games

BOSTON (AP) — Hoping to appease environmentalists, the National Guard has offered to use plastic bullets and weak explosives to keep shelling the seashore for target practice.

The offer came as many residents of this picturesque peninsula are demanding the National Guard pack up and move out of Camp Edwards to prevent any more pollution of the drinking supply for 200,000 people.

But the guardsmen say they can fire away and keep the water clean in the process. Others disagree.

"The troops can go to [other bases] to train, but Cape Codders have nowhere else to go for their drinking water," John DeVillars, regional administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, told The Boston Globe yesterday.

"The fact is that training and drinking-water protection are not compatible on Cape Cod," he said.

Since World War I, members of the military have been training at the Massachusetts Military Reservation, on which sits Camp Edwards, the National Guard training facility.

But decades of shelling and shooting left the area full of lead, which studies claim pose a health threat to the groundwater. Last year, in a first for the EPA, military training was suspended for environmental and public health reasons.

The suspension allowed the National Guard to keep practicing with plastic bullets, but banned all explosives like mortar and artillery shells. The guard's compromise offer is to let it continue using explosives, albeit low-grade ones.

Major Michael Pacheco, spokesman for the state National Guard, said the Guard realizes people are concerned about protecting the environment. But he does not agree it is time for the Guard to take its war games elsewhere.

"You're talking about the sons and daughters of people who live in the commonwealth who need to be trained in readiness," he said. Pacheco complained that if the Guard is banned from the reservation, its members would have to travel to New York or New Jersey to get to the next closest training areas of sufficient size.

But DeVillars and others, including the Association for the Preservation of Cape Cod, are unmoved. They want to turn at least part of the base into a federal wildlife refuge to protect the water and 25 rare or endangered animals and plants.

Honduras loses more than lives

By Peter Muello
Associated Press

TEGUCIGALPA, Honduras — Maria Carmen Rodriguez daubed at the black muck on a 1997 class photo, saved from the rubble that was once a school. The students were smiling. "Happy Vacation" was written on the blackboard.

"Happy times," the principal said, her voice a whisper. "Now we have lost everything."

After 121 years, the Francisca Reyes school for girls is no more. Hurricane Mitch and the furious waters of the Rio Grande Choluteca carried most of it away.

The scene is much the same in towns and villages across the Central American country. The storm that killed an estimated 10,000 people also wiped out one-quarter of Honduras' schools, leaving education in limbo and the future in doubt.

In the capital, Tegucigalpa, the floodwaters rose to the third floor of the Education Ministry building, destroying computers and wiping out school records.

"The entire educational history of the country was lost," said Carmen Siri, an education specialist with the U.N. Development Program in Honduras.

The Education Ministry canceled the rest of the school year, sending children home and teachers to distribute medicine, take census counts and help clean the streets.

Minister Jose Ramon Calix Figueroa said the decision was mostly because of safety and health concerns. But there's a more practical reason: most of the schools are being used as temporary shelters for the homeless.

Nearly 2 million people were evacuated from their homes when Mitch hit, and relocating them costs money that Honduras doesn't have.

With no school and no records, the ministry is deciding what to do about students. What grades do they get? Who passes and who fails?

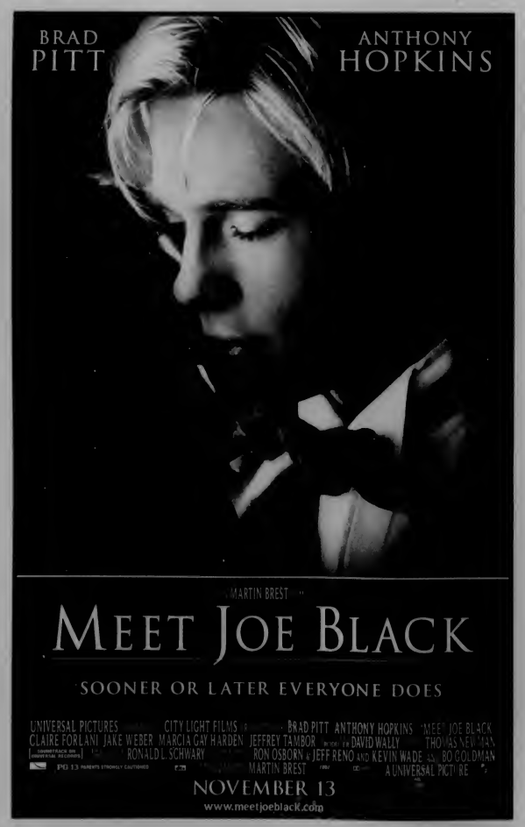
Calix Figueroa said most schools will use the shortened year as a base, and those who flunk will get another chance to pass at a make-up exam. Where schools and documents were destroyed, teachers will try to reconstruct the student records from memory.

Just rebuilding the schools will cost at least $35 million, Calix Figueroa said, and he doesn't know where it will come from. The government is negotiating with U.S. AID, the World Bank and the Inter-American Development Bank, among other lenders.

"So far, we haven't got a cent," he said.

At the Alvaro Contreras grade school — where barely two weeks ago 1,500 children were studying — twisted iron dangles from concrete pillars, snapped in half by Mitch's rage. An uprooted pine tree lies on the basketball court, where the floodwaters tore the rim from the backboard. Scavengers pick through trash covering a classroom floor.

"This all will be rebuilt, but not here," Calix Figueroa said. The kindergarten Mundo Maravilloso, or Wonderful World, was luckier. It was built up the hill, and the river only came up to the windowsill.



"It was a terrible shock," said principal Mirna Ruth Flores. "The water broke down the door and took out all the desks." Behind her, a brigade of 36 medical school students use picks and shovels to scrape up the muck and debris and load it into wheelbarrows. They also have no classes, and the National Autonomous University is a shelter for 6,000.

CIA dierctor strongly opposes release of convicted spy

By John Diamond
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — CIA Director George Tenet vehemently opposed the release of convicted spy Jonathan Pollard and told President Clinton during Mideast peace talks that such a release would make it impossible for him to continue as director, according to a Clinton administration official.

Tenet, who played a central though low-profile role in the peace talks, knew that Pollard's release was a high priority for Israel and expected the subject to come up at the talks last month in rural Maryland. Pollard, a former naval intelligence officer, is serving a life sentence for handing over thousands of top-secret documents to Israel in 1984 and 1985.

As the talks between Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat dragged on and it appeared that the U.S. refusal to release Pollard would become a deal-breaker, Tenet grew concerned that Clinton might yield to Netanyahu's demand, said the administration official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

At that point, Tenet told Clinton that the U.S. intelligence community feels strongly about Pollard's betrayal and that any sense that Tenet had acquiesced in his release would make it difficult for him to continue in his job.

Clinton, who mediated the peace talks, eventually refused to release Pollard but agreed to an open-ended review of the Pollard case.

The New York Times, citing several administration sources, reported yesterday that Tenet "threatened to resign" if Pollard were released, a characterization the White House disputed. The CIA would neither confirm nor deny the Times report.

Late in the Mideast talks, reports began to circulate from Israeli diplomatic officials that the United States had agreed to release Pollard and that plans were being made to fly him back to Israel on Netanyahu's plane with the Israeli delegation. U.S. officials disputed those reports at the time.

White House spokesman David Leavy said anew yesterday that Clinton never agreed to Netanyahu's request and Clinton did not have to be talked out of freeing Pollard by Tenet, National Security Adviser Sandy Berger or others.

"The president at no point made a decision to release Mr. Pollard," Leavy said. When Netanyahu made his strong feelings about Pollard's release clear toward the end of the talks at Maryland's Wye River Conference Center, "the president took that on board.

"He consulted with Mr. Tenet, with Mr. Berger and others. It was clear that this was something the president wasn't willing to do at that time."

Netanyahu had told Clinton that he needed Pollard's release in order to win support for the peace agreement from the right wing of his governing coalition.

Freeing Pollard has been a favorite cause for years among Israeli nationalists, and Netanyahu's government has made some high-profile efforts on his behalf. Netanyahu has said that Pollard's spying was wrong, but that on a humanitarian basis alone he should be allowed to go free.

U.S. intelligence and law enforcement agents say it is irrelevant that Pollard was acting on behalf of a U.S. ally. Much of what Pollard is believed to have disclosed to Israel concerned detailed U.S. intelligence on Soviet weaponry, a cache of documents and spy satellite photographs big enough to fill a room 10 feet by 6 feet by 6 feet.

I dream of Jeannie

Two Sundays ago one of the most improbable things to ever happen to anyone I know, happened to me. First let me do some unnecessary build up and then I'll finally tell you what happened. It was Nov. 1 and I was kind of hung over from Halloween.

My girlfriend and I had made plans to climb a mountain with some of my family. We got up without really getting any sleep and then proceeded to Mount Monadnock a 3,166– foot mountain somewhere near Keene, N.H. About three hours after we arrived at the base we reached the top. The important thing is that since we were at the top naturally we had to walk down. From the peak I could see something shiny a few hundred feet down. It was a lamp. Not a lamp with a light bulb, but a lamp that looked like it would have a genie in it.

Dan Viens

I showed the lamp to everyone that I was with. They all thought that it was pretty cool. Right away I started joking that maybe it was a magic lamp. Everyone agreed that it did sort of look like the typical magic lamp, but I don't think that any of us really believed that it could be one. I rubbed it a couple of times, but no genie popped out of it. I was a little disappointed, but I kept the lamp, figuring that it would be money in my room.

Then the other day I was watching some daytime talk show and Dr. Ruth was the guest. She referred to women as a lamp in the life of men. She said that women always shed light on the lives of men. Then she mentioned that men must treat women sensually and that women need to be held and snuggled with.

I didn't really pay too much mind to this, but a light bulb did go on in my head. I thought that maybe I wasn't being sensual enough to the lamp. That night I brought the lamp to bed. I held it, snuggled with it and I fell asleep with it in my arms.

The next morning I woke up and was terrified by a gorgeous genie floating above me. She was incredibly happy to see me because I was the first person in hundreds of years to figure out her secret. After some small talk I cut to the chase and asked about my three wishes. She then broke my heart by telling me that she could only grant me one wish. (It had something to do with a genie labor dispute.)

"I immediately wished for a million wishes. Then she slapped me directly across the face. Apparently this is the cardinal sin when it comes to wishing with genies."

I immediately wished for a million wishes. Then she slapped me directly across the face. Apparently this is the cardinal sin when it comes to wishing with genies. She informed me that after making such a stupid wish she was no longer obligated to grant me any wishes. However, she was very "gorny" (genie horny) to grant a wish. It was a completely different ballgame now though since I only had one wish to use.

I first thought of wishing for an obscene amount of money. With this money I could pay for a perfect wedding and maybe even bribe all of professional baseball to let the Red Sox win the world series. Then I got to thinking that wishing for money is boring. I mean if I only get one wish from a genie in my life I want it to be a flashy wish.

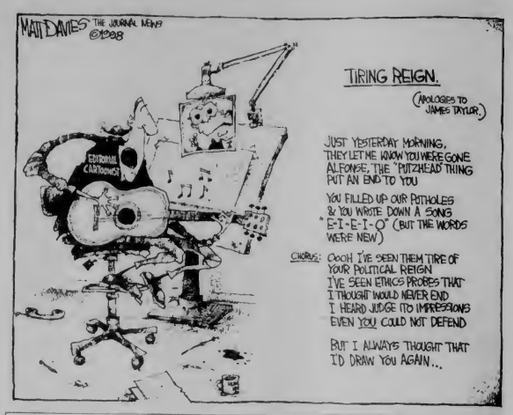
I thought of wishing for world peace, but if we didn't have threats to national security then all of the Americans in the armed forces would be out of jobs. Also it is nice that every 10 or so years all of us can unite to route against some unworthy foe of the United States.

I also thought of wishing for whirled peas, but they upset my stomach.

I went through a ton of ideas. Finally, as my genie was becoming impatient, I came up with the pinnacle of all wishes. This wish, as many of you may have guessed, is teleportation. It is the ability to go from one place to another without really traveling. For instance I could travel from my room in IQA to the front row wherever Phish is playing in seconds by just thinking about it.

Let's start with the monetary evidence. If I wanted to I could teleport right into any bank vault and take as much money as I pleased. Not only would I have access to all of the money in the world, but I could do a ton of other things too. I would never have to take a ski lift again in my life. I would simply ski down and then teleport back to the top.

Another plus is that I would never have to pay for a ticket to a concert again. I could just teleport right into any arena. I would, naturally, be able to see all of the world's greatest sights and I would never be late for anything again unless I was sleeping.



I had definitely decided to wish for teleportation when all of a sudden my genie informed me that I had wasted too much time and that she could no longer grant my wish. I was flabbergasted and crushed. She explained that the genie labor disputes had been upgraded to a legitimate strike.

My stomach began tying itself into knots at the realization that I had squandered one of the greatest opportunities to ever come along in my life. I had teleportation in my grasp, but I had waited too long to actually taste its fruits. My muscles began to tighten, my hands clenched and I saw red. I couldn't help myself.

I reached for her neck and began to choke her. I choked her so hard that her genie powers were of no use. Then the RA from the floor above me walked by my room on her rounds. She stopped the altercation and then wrote me up for attempted murder of a genie and for three empty beer cans that she saw.

The charge involving the genie was dropped, but I have to do 15 years of hard labor for the three aluminum cans. Now instead of being able to go wherever I want in the universe at the drop of a hat I am stuck smashing boulders somewhere out behind the stadium.

Bathroom buddies

Men and women are very different. For centuries, it has been a cause of speculation between the sexes. I don't need to go through all the differences. I just wanted to explain something to the male population, a question every man secretly wonders but will never fully understand: why women go to the bathroom in pairs.

Girls, you know what I'm talking about. You're at a party, talking to that hot guy from your sociology class, when your roommate grabs you. "Come with me to the bathroom," she implores. "No, I don't have to go," you hiss, while trying to smile at your ex-boyfriend provocatively. "Please," she begs, sending you desperate signals with her eyes. "Just come with me." You give up and reluctantly leave with your roommate.

"Men should try it sometime. The bathroom, surprisingly, can be fun — there's no better place for a bonding session."

Christine Coco

As you get into the back of the seemingly never–ending line to the bathroom, you ask, slightly peevishly, "So, what's up?" "Nothing," she giggles, "I just didn't want to pee alone, and besides, I wanted to know what's going on with that guy. I think he likes you!"

Your annoyance forgotten, you gab about how cute he is until finally it's your turn to use the bathroom. You and your roommate go in and don't re–emerge until the people outside start pounding on the door.

Now, guys, don't start speculating any sexual fantasies. This is a purely innocent feminine ritual. While in the privacy of the bathroom and out of sight of men, women drop all pretenses. Brief friendships are made as girls exchange make–up, gossip and stories, or confrontations may take place. Girls can be petty and jealous, or comforting and loyal, and these emotions are often glimpsed in the only place that they can be alone with one another.

Of course, another big factor is alcohol. At parties and other events where drinking is involved, restrooms are frequented a lot more often, particularly by women who reputedly have a smaller bladder than men. (Has this ever been proven?) And of course, alcohol makes even the quietest person outgoing and talkative, so naturally you're going to want to talk at length to the person at the sink next to yours about how you, too, look absolutely pale and yes, doesn't that girl over there look like a hitch.

Men should try it sometime. The bathroom, surprisingly, can be fun. There's no better place for a bonding session among friends, whether by talking or having a good water fight. Many men wouldn't consider hanging out in a restroom with a pal, which I frankly attribute to homophobic fears. Some straight men are paranoid that their peers will get the wrong idea about their sexual orientation if they act dependant upon or affectionate to their friends, like girls often are.

Maybe it's better that this distinction between the sexes exists. Imagine seeing two guys entering the mens room, arm–in–arm and whispering among themselves. You would assume that they were "gay" because men typically don't act in this manner. Societal norms teach us as children how we are "supposed" to act according to our gender. We are told that girls are emotional and boys are strong. And to act out of these confines would deem you a "tomboy" or "sissy."

However, it takes a very courageous individual to shun the opinions of others. As a rule, women generally care less than men do about receiving the approval of strangers. Perhaps this is why women don't give a second thought to going to the bathroom with a friend, and therefore leading others to believe that they are unable to complete a basic biological function alone.

Doonsbury By Garry Trudeau

Our psychic friends

I watch too much TV. I say this because I'm about to write a column about commercials for Psychic Phone Buddies and the like. You know the commercials I'm talking about — you're up in the high–end of the HSCN spectrum (Comedy Central, Cartoon Network and Much Music), it's fairly late at night, and the show takes a break.

You don't sigh, though, or even go take that long–overdue pee–pee, because despite the fact that you were enjoying The Daily Show or Cow and Chicken you just know that the Psychic Phone Buddies ads are going to be just as entertaining.

The first thing you see is the Psychic Phone Buddies' Spokeswoman. She's black, plump, rather short, very energetic and has exactly one remaining brain cell struggling to catch its own tail. At least that's how it appears based on her reactions to the various cracked–up people and white trash she interviews. There is this one part that I always look forward to and even announce to whoever happens to be in my room eating my food at the time.

"Look" I say, grinning maniacally and drooling ever so subtly from the corners of my eager lips, "She's about to make the face!"

And then she does it. Some woman tells her that her Personal Psychic Buddy For Life knew she was going to Europe, and the Spokeswoman assumes this expression. It's one of total, mind–blowing ecstasy. Her eyes bug out and become even more shiny, her lower lip crumples in, her forehead wrinkles, and, startled, she steps back slightly from her interviewee.

Her whole existence is crushed by the sheer power of the psychic who knew the exact continent, and by the fact that she is gifted to have the privilege of standing next to and worshipping the person who gets to move there. That expression is classic; there should be a videotape of the Spokeswoman making that face over and over again — I would buy it. It would be called "Portrait of the Moron on Basic Cable."

I've been seeing these commercials ever since I came here two months ago, and they're still on with alarming frequency. Now, since airtime on such mammoth stations as Much Music doesn't come cheap, it stands to reason that the Psychic Phone Buddies Corporation International must be making some money. It can't be from the people who give testimonials on the commercial, either, unless they're allowed to pay in food stamps. So who are these people?

"Some woman tells her that her Personal Psychic Buddy For Life knew she was going to Europe, and the Spokeswoman assumes this expression. It's one of total, mind–blowing ecstasy."

Rob Schultz

It could be the fine folks over in the Bursar's office, asking for the names, addresses and worst fears of the students who have outstanding bills. I can just see myself waking up strapped into a double–chambered mask with a rat in it as some guy in a purple turtleneck sneers "Oh, yes, Miss Dominique knows what you dread. Perhaps now you pay your OIT bill, yes?"

It could be my advisor asking which outlandish and useless courses I should take next semester.

It could be Axl Rose looking for new and improved ways to screw one of the greatest bands ever. Not really connected to the subject at hand, but on my mind nonetheless.

It could be Mom looking for the dirt on me now that I'm out of the household, which would explain why every time she calls me I am accused of snorting cocaine off the breasts of nubile young females, not to mention wearing dirty underwear.

It could be nubile young females, looking for more ways to avoid me.

It could be any of these people, and it's probably all of them, but even then they couldn't keep the Psychic Buddies in business. It's probably also the one category of people that I didn't mention: stupid people. People with sad lives, five children and a good job flippin' patties at Mickey D's. People with Harvard degrees in astrology and UMass degrees in being really smart and intelligent and stuff. In other words, me in five years.

It will be worth calling my Best Psychic Friend for Eternity up and giving them all my hard–earned cash in exchange for all the secrets of the universe, as long as I get to see that face.

ANIMATION SENSATION!!

Escape to Toontown

Bryan McAllister

When I was a kid, I think I watched a little movie called Bedknobs and Broomsticks 144 times in one day. You know the one — it starred Angela Lansbury as a witch and those two little fresh–faced British kids who seemed to be in every movie involving precocious activities.

But it was the movie's animation sequences that really hooked me. As in previous live action/animated films like Mary Poppins, or the brilliant achievement of 1989's Who Framed Roger Rabbit?, Bedknobs and Broomsticks continued a theme of escaping from the mundane life we live. In this new, magical world, penguins could serve us lunch or a football game could be played with a couple of hippos for linemen.

Animation is the yellow brick road to that escape. After all, "to animate" means, literally, to make "vibrant — to bring to life. And ever since Walt Disney drew the sketch for Mickey Mouse our imaginations have been quenched with images of splendor and wonder, taken into little kingdoms of princesses, lion kings and fairy tale endings. Or in the case of A Bug's Life (November 25) — insects.

or in Dreamworks' The Prince of Egypt (December 18) — the story of Moses.

A whole world of visual ideas — even those as big as parting the Red Sea — that are impossible to capture in reality can be translated to the big or small screen via this unique art form.

Sometimes those worlds are not fantasy lands but suburban microcosms, where American life is skewed and satirized with little limit. In good ol' South Park or Springfield, small boys discover that life, basically, makes little sense, and the only way to get through it is with a biting sense of humor. "The Simpsons" and "South Park" continued a recent wave of animation that is far different from the Saturday morning cartoons that we all remember so fondly.

The history of animation, remarkably, can be roughly translated to that of human history itself. Think of the 1930s–50s — with productions like Bambi, Snow White, Dumbo, Peter Pan and Cinderella — as Disney's Classical Age. But after Sleeping Beauty in 1959 to basically the late '70s, animation in Hollywood went through its Dark Age period, with little output whatsoever.

It was the 80s, though, that saw a resurgence of animation that was largely Neoclassical. Who Framed Roger Rabbit? captured this ideal best by taking a 1940's–style film noir plot and, in an unprecedented treaty made by rivals Disney and Warner Brothers, included a plethora of animated characters from Bugs Bunny to Dumbo. To see Daffy and Donald Duck battle it out on stage was pure nostalgic delight.

The Little Mermaid in 1989 was a milestone in two ways — it marked the resurrection of Disney classics, as well as the last Disney animated film to be done by traditional hand– drawn animation.

All questions of the artistic credibility of animation were dropped when Beauty and the Beast was released soon after. The first animated film to be nominated for Best Picture, it's arguably also the greatest animated film of all time, with The Lion King close behind.

Totally animated TV

Adam Martignetti

In an interview right before the finale of his hit TV show, Jerry Seinfeld lamented a whole slew of show ideas that unfortunately never got made. Among the list was his idea for an episode of "Seinfeld" done entirely in "clay–mation" — close enough to animation for my purposes here. With this in mind, I began to wonder what the television world would look like if every show were animated. For your viewing pleasure, here's totally animated TV.

• "Melrose Place" would look a lot more like a Royal Rumble on MTV's "Celebrity Deathmatch." Just watch out for the use of illegal forearm shots.

• The characters on "Beverly Hills, 90210" would look far too preppy and far too old to be believable. Then the animated show would be aired six years longer than anyone cared. Hey, wait a minute...

• An animated version of Barney would replace Bill Cosby on his self–entitled show or maybe vice versa. Anyway, nobody would notice the difference to either program. Just change the name from "Cosby" to "Barney and wife."

• Michael J. Fox would look a lot more like Bart Simpson, who is closer to the actor's actual height, than he currently does as the assistant to the mayor on "Spin City."

• "Everybody Loves Raymond" star, Ray Romano, would be replaced by Jay Sherman, Jon Lovitz's character, from Comedy Central's "The Critic." You realize that he's on the air and you suspect that he might be pretty funny, but you never actually sit down and watch his show. In fact, nobody you know ever does either; nobody really likes him.

• "Popeye's" gaunt Olive Oil, would replace Emmy–nominated actress, Calista Flockhart, on her show, "Ally MacBeal." This way the show can retain most of its large female audience, and there would be no need to change the unisex bathroom.

• Kenny from "South Park" would replace the newly installed Jon Lovitz on "Newsradio" with the desperate hope that after someone "killed Kenny," the great Phil Hartman would return to the show, in his place.

• The characters from the movie "Toy Story" would replace the actors on "Friends." On the one hand, you see that they are all visually beautiful, but on the other, you realize that what's happening is completely unbelievable and doesn't actually happen in the real world.

• Of course, Dr. Katz would replace Kelsey Grammer on "Frasier" under one condition: they get rid of those annoying squiggly lines so I don't get a headache when I watch it.

Supposed... Junkie not just fluffy pop

By Matthew Nixon

SUPPOSED FORMER INFATUATION JUNKIE
Alanis Morissette
Maverick/Reprise

Who is this woman? Does it matter? Whatever your answer, Supposed Former Infatuation Junkie is one amazing album. The name, Alanis Morissette, conjures up so much: her days of bubble-gum pop in Canada, seemingly round the clock airings of "You Oughta Know" and millions of copies of her last album, Jagged Little Pill, being snapped up by the youth of the world.

Alanis seemed everywhere between 1995 and 1997. Every potential hit was squeezed out of Jagged Little Pill before she vanished from the spotlight.

Much of the material here was inspired by a six-month trip to India (from where the album's cover image of a moral code sign was found). The resulting album serves as a very personal journal of her time away from hit-making. Her emotions are all over the place on her latest effort. Her vocal style goes from sweet whispers to angry wails. Alanis has a lot to say.

This is not fluffy pop. Subject matter ranges from spirituality to abusive relationships and beyond. The music is just as varied, going from songs featuring fragile whispering on top of a sprinkling of piano accompaniment ("That I Would Be Good") to more synthetic arrangements that blast out of the speakers as heard on "So Pure" and "Joining You."

"Thank You" is the album's jewel and, rightfully so, the first single. With an attention grabbing video featuring a nude Alanis, this hauntingly simple ode to things that have challenged her in no way reflects the mind-blowing range of material found on the album.

Morrisette starts many of her songs with a phrase which is repeated throughout the song. It is a technique that works particularly well with her varied vocal deliveries. She lays a lot on the table through her storytelling. The sheer level of emotional baggage she describes can be overwhelming, and this 71-minute disc can only be taken in small doses at first.

Glen Ballard collaborates once again with Alanis on the writing of the music. The two make a fine songmaking duo. The keyboard introduction to "Thank You" is one of this year's finer musical ideas, as is the breathy flute playing on "That I Would Be Good."

Excessive exposure to Alanis over the years has turned many off of choosing to listen to her work. However, this recording is worth investigating. If you choose not to, be forewarned that 1999 will no doubt be another great year for Alanis as this compact disc is full of potential singles: "UR," "Would Not Come," "One" and "Unsent." B+

PNYC captures Roseland experience

PNYC
Portishead
London

New York City, July 24, 1997. Roseland Ballroom — 239 West 52nd Street. An evening with Portishead: SOLD OUT.

For those in attendance, and those who wish that they had been, Portishead has released their most famous live performance here in the States on PNYC — Roseland, New York Live.

"It's to document what we've been up to in the past year," said Geoff Barrow and Adrian Utley in a recent on-line press conference.

Garnering international success with their 1994 debut release, Dummy, Portishead have established themselves as one of the most innovative and eloquent contemporary bands. Their performance at Roseland came two months prior to the release of Portishead.

Rather than using the main stage, a circular stage was used in the center of the ballroom floor. Band members Beth Gibbons (vocals), Geoff Barrow (drums and decks), Adrian Utley (guitars), and Dave McDonald (sound) were present along with live members John Boggott (keyboards), Jim Barr (bass), Clive Deamer (percussion, drums) and Andy Smith (turntables).

Also accompanying Portishead was a 30-piece string section and a five-piece horn ensemble, conducted by Nick Ingman whose credits include working with Radiohead.

PNYC, the album, does not contain the exact set list from the Roseland show.

"We felt not all the tracks worked without the visuals, and as always, wanted to make a rounded album so we missed some tracks out and added two more from our tour," said Utley.

Not played at Roseland are a fierce version of their radio hit from Dummy, "Sour Times," recorded in San Francisco and "Roads," also from Dummy, recorded this past summer in Norway. The addition of these tracks, the deletion of such excellent songs as "Numb," and the reworking of the live tracks take away from the authenticity of the album.

The intimate setting that the band worked so hard to create in New York is damaged by just the knowledge that you're not hearing what the audience in Roseland heard. However, the fact that PNYC is an excellent recording cannot be denied. The sweeping orchestration under the direction of Utley and Ingman is amazing, as is the band's surprising experimentations; for example, Gibbons' vocal distortion on "Half Day Closing."

"It was an idea that we had that day and Beth really liked the way her voice sounded through the Lesley — we're always looking for new sounds," Barrow and Utley said.

"We mixed Roseland together and even though you don't have complete control [because it's a live event] I think there's something that makes it different and interesting to work on, rather than it being a completely controlled environment," said Barrow and Utley of the crafting of Portishead's live sound on the disc.

For those looking for the ultimate live experience — as close as one can get without actually seeing Portishead live — you might want to check out PNYC — the film. (If you live on campus you've probably already seen it on Much Music) released on video along with the album.

Originally released theatrically in Europe to coincide with the release of Portishead, the video consists of the entire Roseland set and a 10-minute film called Road Trip, which many may have seen when Portishead came to Worcester this past March. The film is mostly shot through the windshield of a car in downtown UK traffic, soundtracked by DJ Andy Smith, ending with signs reading "welcome to Portishead," the town near Bristol after which they named their band.

Sandler carries The Waterboy

THE WATERBOY
Directed by Frank Coraci
with Adam Sandler, Kathy Bates, Fairuza Balk
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

Coming off far and away his best movie, Adam Sandler reunites with Frank Coraci, who directed the surprisingly good Wedding Singer, in his latest movie, The Waterboy. In his new film, Sandler returns to his old tricks, spreading his innocent, child-like charm and equally sophomoric humor to audiences.

Anyone who has ever seen an Adani Sandler movie, could have predicted how The Waterboy would turn out. After overcoming a challenge, impossible to anyone but Sandler, with the utmost hilarity, he then proceeds to win the affections of some amazingly hot girl with his goofy charms. I digress though; there were obviously not going for artistic merit here.

Sandler plays Bobby Boucher: a lowly, 31-year-old Waterboy whose [illegible] and his overprotective mama. After getting fired from his job, Bobby takes another waterboy job on a lowly college football team.

Soon, the coach discovers that Bobby is a tackling machine. Despite his mother's protests, Bobby is soon playing "football." From here on, the film amounts to a highlight reel of the NFL's Greatest Hits with some distractingly poor "dramatic" moments. Yes, Sandler's team wins the big bowl game and he marries the girl, but anyone could have told you that.

In addition to Sandler's already outlandish brand of comedy, the movie is set in the bayous of Louisiana, which opens up a whole new world of stereotypical Southern jokes. Admittedly, the references to professional wrestling, the inaudible Southern drawl, and tractor driving were pretty funny, but this strategy has its drawbacks as well.

It means that we have to put up with Kathy Bates, Bobby's mother, who plays the poor version of her character from the big boat movie. Unfortunately, her performance is as equally terrible and only serves to drag the movie down.

Let's face it though, none of this really matters because we're paying to see Adam Sandler be Adam Sandler. We don't care that Henry Winkler, aka "The Fonz," was fairly lovable and humorous as the head coach of the football team. We don't care that Rob Schneider makes a couple of very funny cameo appearances. We don't even care if the movie has a plot; in fact, the plot is just a distraction. We want Adam Sandler.

Sandler is irresistibly funny and this movie is no exception. In fact, no other actor could have possibly drawn in $39 million, shattering box office records, with this movie.

Sandler's boyish good looks let him excel at playing the slow-witted character, who never fails to surprise the audience with his humorous quips or ability to rise to the occasion. Sandler is simply charismatic — utterly likable in every possible way. The audience identifies with him, so he could do just about anything and we would appreciate it.

That said, this movie tries to ride Sandler's popularity and appeal a bit too much. The joke tires pretty quickly. If you've seen Sandler power-bomb one guy, then you have seen most of the movie. In addition, the Southern setting might be a bit over the top. Sandler usually shines because he is dim-witted, when others around him are seemingly normal. Since just about everyone is slow in the movie, Sandler loses some of his luster at times; the movie is almost too dumbed-down, if that's possible.

Lastly, any rudimentary attempts at making a coherent point were poorly executed and made for some pretty uninteresting, unfunny lulls in the movie.

There's Something About Mary set the standard for this type of outrageous comedy last summer and The Waterboy does not live up to this precedent. In fact, I preferred Billy Madison and Happy Gilmore to this, Sandler's latest offering. Still, there's no denying that Sandler is enormously engaging and the Waterboy certainly shines at times, it's just a bit too inconsistent to be a Sandler classic.

With audiences embracing his latest movie, it's unlikely that we'll see a change from Adam Sandler, like we did from Jim Carrey, anytime soon. B–

Giving some insight to the inner workings of Portishead, Barrow explained, "We have creative differences, but that's what makes a band. Beth writes the songs..."

"That make the whole world sing" cut in Utley, "...myself and Adrian write all the music together."

Both Barrow and Utley described their studio collaboration with Gibbons. "We tend to get in the studio and thrash about till something happens."

Gibbons, Barrow and Utley plan on taking some time off before preparations begin on a new album. What will they do with this time?

"Drink, drink, watch films, drink, listen to music, drink, play the bass badly," said Barrow.

Utley's plans are not far off either, "Drink, listen to music, drink, sit in front of the computer, drink, moan, drink and find a reason to drink some more... ahh got one... drink."

On being musicians, Barrow and Utley talk about the highs and lows that come with their profession. "It's what we've always wanted to do — but they can suck like any other job at times... as long as it's experimental, forward thinking, and honest it could go anywhere."

And how do Barrow and Utley feel about PNYC? "We're really proud of it and a lot of our fans wanted to get hold of it [the Roseland recordings]."

And we're so glad we now have it.

Brutality and death — next time on "Cops"

Tube Notes with Ryan Benharris

There are a lot of TV shows out there, and there are a lot of different things to watch. Lately, I've been hooked on those awful and violent shows like "Cops," and "Real Stories of the Highway Patrol."

Last night at about 1:30 a.m., I was sitting up watching "Real TV" and my roommate said something that I think pretty much sums up my question about these real life documentaries. He asked me, "Why do we like to watch people get hurt?"

It's an interesting question, and I think the answer routes back to Homer Simpson's response when watching the "football in the groin video," and said, "It's funny cuz I don't know him."

It's amazing how many different shows there are to watch now, and all of them fall into the same category, and all have the same pattern. We watch someone get violently injured, and then we laugh at them. It's all part of the TV industry's new tactic to get people hooked on something that years ago would be considered morally and socially unacceptable, and make it part of the norm. So nonetheless, let's take our "Jerry Springer corrupted minds," and look at all the different choices we have for shock TV.

The show that's been out there for the longest time has to be "Cops." The main problem with "Cops" used to be that it was so politically incorrect that even real life police officers were banning it. However, that was about 10 years ago, and the stuff back then was not nearly as racey as we have today, and I don't think anyone could possibly imagine the things that would grow from that.

I have to admit that there's something satisfying about watching a Chicago police officer walk into a house and find some guy tied up by his wife with the phone cord to the kitchen chair, because he wouldn't buy her a pack of cigarettes. But while I'm watching, I'm constantly thinking about how the shock value has been extremely desensitized.

We think nothing about that family's life, and what could possibly have gone wrong, all we do is laugh because not only does the woman get to go for a ride in the cruiser, but the man also gets a pair of new bracelets, because when the police untied him, he attempted to beat the hell out of his next time on "Cops" shows being developed that depict terrible injuries and in some cases death, that are on every night for our viewing pleasure.

"Real TV" brags that if something bad happens, they'll get it, "caught on tape!" They've shown everything from boating accidents where you can see a person go flying in slow motion out of the boat, to everyone's favorite animal attacks!

It seems like the shows that are on TV either every week, or every night have made some sort of a pact about what they will show on TV. They've decided that they will only show the accidents if the person does not die.

Did you ever wonder why all the cases that they show on these programs end with an interview with the victim? It's because the TV world still has stuck to one simple fact from the beginning of time, and that's, there's nothing funny about death. Apparently there's something funny about a man falling from a plane, and living to tell about it, but if he died, it would be taboo.

All of the new syndicated shows have stemmed from one place. About a year and a half ago, FOX began to run specials entitled, "When Animals Attack!" and "Disasters!" As a matter of fact, FOX ran a special this week end where they advertised a man in Pamplona, Spain getting brutalized by a bull, while being pounded up against a fence. They also had a child who was near train tracks when the train was hit by an oil tanker and everything blew up.

Luckily everyone on the show was not killed, but it really is disturbing that this is considered entertainment. If any one of us who are watching these shows were ever placed in an situation close to these, I'm sure we would not find anything entertaining about it. But once again, we've all been desensitized to a point that almost nothing seems too upsetting to watch.

Blues Traveler delights the Smith crowd

By Tom Sadlowski
Collegian Corespondent

BLUES TRAVELER
John M. Greene Hall
Nov. 10

NORTHAMPTON — Smith College's John M. Greene Hall was filled with the joyful sounds of John Popper and his harmonica, as Blues Traveler performed yet another stellar set in Northampton.

The band was able to capture its audience's attention early with its Top 10 single, "Hook," from its 1994 multi- platinum release Four. "Hook" delighted the crowd and quickly connected the audience to the band's music and mood.

Much of the bands performance was taken from its six releases, the latest of which, Straight on Till Morning, has the lead single "Carolina Blues." The rendition of "Carolina Blues" that they performed this past Tuesday night demonstrated how far the band has come since their high school days in Princeton, N.J.

The quartet barely took time to stop performing as one song slipped right into the next. They jammed to an incredible version of Steve Miller's "The Joker" and displayed their passion on "Mountain Cry."

Lead singer Popper regularly donated his harmonica to the crowd after nearly every song, as guitarist Chan Kinchla and bassist Bob Sheehan continued on their smoking binge.

Song after song was played to perfection with Popper switching between harmonica and guitar. Blues Traveler finally closed with a fancy version of The Beatles' "Come Together" before dismissing the stage.

They reappeared, and with the crowd anticipating their first major hit, "Run-around," Blues Traveler rightfully came out and surpassed the crowds expectations with "The Devil Went to Down to Georgia" to conclude the evening.

Blues Traveler left the stage, but only after a pack or two of cigarettes were lit, and Popper was able to unload his vest full of harmonicas to the desiring crowd.

After spending time with Blues Traveler on the H.O.R.D.E. Festival this past summer, Agents of Good Roots, rejoined them on their fall tour. Their unique sound was a perfect match for Blues Traveler, and this Richmond, Va. band deserved every ovation that it received from the John M. Greene Hall audience.

Touring on their third release, One by One, the quartet performed songs off the album like "Two Bucks in Cash," along with some unreleased material.

Lolita tries, but fails to seduce

By Mike Messaros
Collegian Staff

LOLITA
Directed by Adrion Lyne with Jeremy Irons, Dominique Swain, Melanie Griffith
Playing at Pleasant St. Theater

One cannot judge the new version of Lolita without taking into account the original novel, a book full of purple prose and dark comedy. When the film was made it incited controversy, and found a hard time getting released in the U.S. "Kiddie porn!" the angry mob shouted.

It was eventually released on Showtime ("No Limits"), and has now begun a slow trickle into theaters. With all of the hype and anger surrounding it, going to see it feels like you're in a strange club, watching a snuff film or a Pamela and Tommy Lee honeymoon video.

Unfortunately, the product does not meet the demand. It's just not that great a movie. Besides the fact that anyone who loves the novel will find generous flaws throughout, it's just a slow moving, unemotional and conventional Hollywood film. For all the hype, it's a huge let down.

Missing from the new version is a hungry desperation, the dirty lust that makes the book such a classic. Jeremy Irons, for a while, does cast his imposing shadow on the role quite well, but in the end he lacks the scumminess that Humbert Humbert should present. When he calls Lolita "light of my life, fire of my loins," in the book, it's shocking — he is talking about a little girl here.

The movie refuses to indict Humbert for his actions. In fact, it gives him no actions to be indicted for. Humbert is a passive character, not a filthy seducer. In the end, in trying to humanize his character, to maybe give him layers not evident in the original text, the more fascinating layers are stripped away.

Irons is too genteel for the role. In the book, Humbert fancies himself an academic, and speaks in high, haughty, poetic tones. But in the end, he's only a pedophile, and his fancy book learnin' can't save him from his own jealousy and paranoia.

When the film reaches its conclusion, it doesn't seem so much inevitable as it seems like a plot device — a way to end the movie. Nothing is invested in Humbert, or Lolita, for that matter, that would make us think that their relationship is a matter of life and death.

Director Adrian Lyne does throw in some good visual messages to remind us that this is only a young girl. Lolita, played unevenly by Dominique Swain, is constantly removing her retainer, but after a while you get the feeling that Lyne stole this from Martin Scorsese's Cape Fear.

He introduces Lolita stretched out under a sprinkler, reading a movie star magazine, her sundress clinging to her body, her underwear visible through the thin fabric. And when she flashes that smile, there's that brilliant metal bar across her teeth. And Humbert still stands there, smiling and transfixed.

The beginning is the most successful part of the movie. Scenes where the slightest touch gives Humbert joy, reason to live. When he crawls into Lolita's bed, clutching her doll to read the love note Lolita's mother, played by Melanie Griffith, wrote to him, the film approaches the creepy sensation one would expect it to, but it never pays off.

Other things don't pay off. Twice in the beginning, Humbert is shown hitting his head, but for no reason it seems. At first it seems to be a cheap way to turn it into satire or farce, but by the end, this theme is lost. A lot is lost by the end, including focus.

By the end, the decision to air it on Showtime seems like an ironic one, being that Lyne has crafted a movie closer to the Red Shoe Diaries than to anything else. He has romanticized, idealized and eroticized the Lolita/Humbert relationship. The movie is shot like a romance, with clouds rolling over mountains in the beginning, and dust floating in the air as light streams through windows (Can directors and cinematographers please stop using this tired device?).

There is a scene when Lyne clumsily illustrates the loss of innocence, where Lolita sits on Humberts lap, reading the comics. Slowly you begin to realize that he is having sex with her, as her gaunty, montage of Lolita's open mouth, turned towards the ceiling and gasping with desire.

As a movie, it fails on it's own "merits," but as an interpretation of a classic book, it fails horribly in comparison. C-

Italy & Mid East exhibit at Amherst

By Jason Kadish
Collegian Correspondent

Amherst College's Mead Art Museum is now featuring "The Grand Tour: Italy and the Middle East." The exhibit reflects the travels of 18th and 19th century American and European artists, connoisseurs and amateurs to Rome and the East. This is made possible with a collection of views and souvenirs from foreign lands culled from Mead's permanent collection.

During the 18th and 19th century, young aristocratic gentlemen often traveled for educational purposes to Italy and the Middle East. This "Grand Tour" was undertaken before they married and assumed a leading role in society.

Europe's upper classes were joined by students and the middle-class during the 18th century, the "Golden Age of the Grand Tour."

The Mediterranean cities of Florence, Rome, Venice, and Naples became popular destinations where travelers recorded the many man-made and natural wonders of the area. Those who continued their journey traveled on to North Africa, Magna Graecia, Turkey and the Holy Land as they advanced their studies.

The exhibit features many displays of ancient ruins, landscapes, travel souvenirs and antiques. Many of the works exhibited from Italy are heavily influenced by Renaissance masterpieces. These include paintings by Adolphe Boufuereau, Angelica Kauffmann, Joshua Reynolds, Charles Willson Pealle and Edward Lear.

Sculpture by Joseph Nollekens and William Rinehart will be present alongside written works by Claude Lorrain, Giovanni Piranesi, and James McNeill Whistler.

Travel to the Ottoman Empire and the Holy Lands will be represented in the works of Frederic Edwin Church, Edward Denby and Adolf Schreyer.

Paintings, scrapbooks, and artifacts collected by Amherst College alumni and mid-19th century missionaries to Turkey and Iraq will also be featured in the exhibit.

"The Grand Tour: Italy and the Middle East" will be on display at the Mead Art Museum until April 26, 1999. Jill Meredith, director of the museum, will give a speech titled "British Grand Tourists: Sites, Sensations, and Souvenirs" on Tuesday, Dec. 1, at 12:15 p.m.

The Mead Art Museum is situated on the east side of the College Quadrangle. The museum is open 10 a.m.-4:30 p.m. on weekdays and 1–5 p.m. on weekends (open Thursdays until 9 p.m. when college is in session). Admission is free.

Additional information on exhibitions and programs can be found on the Internet (http://www.amherst.edu/~mead) or by calling (413) 542-2335.

Have clean hands in four easy steps

Germs are everywhere — on telephones, doorknobs, desks, etc... Handwashing eliminates germs. As simple as handwashing may seem, there is a definite technique to good handwashing.

1. Turn on the water. Adjust temperature. Wet hands and leave water running.
2. Apply soap to hands. Vigorously rub all surfaces of hands for 10–15 seconds.
3. Rinse hands thoroughly.
4. Dry hands with a paper towel and use a paper towel to turn the water faucet off.

It is especially important to follow these handwashing techniques when someone you live with is sick. Handwashing is the easiest, most effective way to prevent infections.

Yesterday, when my roommate was walking to Whitmore, he saw a Doberman pincher jump up and eat a bird right out of the sky. When he told me about it, all I could think is, "I wish I was there, that'd be the coolest thing ever!"

There is a line that I refuse to cross though. There is an entire series of movies that you can rent entitled Faces of Death, that show actual deaths of people and animals, and in some caset make jokes about it. Nothing is fake, and everything is enough to make your stomach sick. Since I really can't say much about the movies because I have never watched one, I really can't say what they contain exactly.

I do know that there's nothing they won't show, and they encourage animal cruelty. I've never been the type of person to discourage watching anything, because I'll pretty much watch whatever you put in front of me, but I know that these videos are wrong, and I urge everyone not to rent them, and maybe they'll stop being made.

It seems that the world is making a turn towards more shock. When the top-rated talk show is "Jerry Springer" and "Cops" isn't even considered risky anymore, you know that TV is becoming more dangerous in its attempt to gain viewers. But here's my tip — be careful as you walk on campus, because you never know who may be carrying a video camera!

Henry Winkler, aka "The Fonz," stars with Adam Sandler in The Waterboy.

A selection of reviewed films playing in the local area:

ANTZ (Dir Eric Darnell, with the voices of Woody Allen, Sharon Stone, playing at Hampshire). From the very first scene, Antz captivates the audience with its small, fanciful world, creating an elaborate, visually deep microcosm of our own society. Worker ant Z (Allen) searches for princess Bala (Stone) while saving his colony from evil. Features a witty script and the voices of Sylvester Stallone and Gene Hackman. B (Adam Martignetti)

APT PUPIL (Dir Bryan Singer, with Brad Renfro, Ian McKellen, playing at Hampshire) Singer's follow-up to The Usual Suspects doesn't have the ending of that first film, but it has all the elements of darkness and evil, along with some great acting by Brad Renfro and Ian McKellen. Singer masterfully puppeteers the characters in a story about a young boy searching for the secrets of an old Nazi war criminal. Based on the novella by Stephen King. B+ (A.M.)

BELOVED (Dir Johnathan Demme, with Oprah Winfrey, Danny Glover, playing at Mountain Farms). Beloved haunts us as we should be haunted, giving us a necessary, disturbing portrait of slavery in post–Civil War Ohio. Imperfect but passionate, director Demme elicits strong performances from Winfrey, Glover and Kimberly Elise and transforms Toni Morrison's non–linear novel into something a bit more accessible, but still shocking. A– (Rob Roensch)

LOLITA (Dir Adrian Lyne, with Jeremy Irons, Dominque Swain, playing at Pleasant St.) With all of the hype and anger surrounding this new version of Lolita, going to see it feels like you're in a strange club, watching a snuff film or a Pamela and Tommy Lee honeymoon video. Unfortunately, the product simply does not meet the demand. The story of an old scholar falling in love with a pre-teen girl is vastly inferior to the artistic eroticism of the classic novel, largely because of inconsistent performances from Irons and Swain and Hollywoodized directing from Lyne. C– (Mike Messaros)

PLEASANTVILLE (Dir Gary Ross, with Tobey Mcguire, Joan Allen, playing at Hampshire) Simple fable of two 90's teenagers wisked into a 50's TV show turns into a slightly flawed but pleasing parable of anti–conformity and following your heart. In perfect "Pleasantville," Mom always cooks a hearty breakfast, Dad's in a bowling league and the basketball team always has a perfect shooting percentage. But all is not well in happyland: along with the perfect life comes crushing conformity and emotional deadness, symbolized here with black and white film. Brilliant use of color and visual effects relieve this. B+ (R.R.)

PRACTICAL MAGIC (Dir Griffin Dunne, with Sandra Bullock, Nicole Kidman, playing at Mountain Farms) Practical Magic is nearly two hours of music, special effects and cute acting in search of a real movie. Sandra Bullock and Nicole Kidman do their best in hollow roles as two bewitched sisters dealing with the problems of life and love, but Practical Magic is much too cliched and empty. C– (A.M.)

THE WATERBOY (Dir Frank Coraci, with Adam Sandler, Henry Winkler, playing at Hampshire) Hot off The Wedding Singer, Sandler's most complete movie, the resident Hollywood goofball puts together a by–the–numbers, cliched sports flick in The Waterboy. But since when age we looking at artistic merit. Sandler plays Bobby Boucher, a dumb Cajun waterboy who soon discovers a talent for flying tackles and joins the team. Sandler is funny and charismatic as always, but this a one–joke movie. B– (A.M.)

WHAT DREAMS MAY COME (Dir Vincent Ward, with Robin Williams, Cuba Gooding Jr., playing at Hoyts, Springfield). What Dreams May Come begins with the form of a hero's journey into the underworld and then revisions it through the lens of Hollywood schmaltz. The movie is tear– jerking and occasionally beautiful, especially some eerie, hypnotic editing and sharp special effects that turn a painting into a landscape. Williams plays a doctor whose death echoes that of his children years before, and journeys to heaven to find them, and soon after, his wife. But What Dreams May Come is a hollow exercise in American pop– spirituality, glossing over complicated ideas like religion, madness, and family. C– (R.R.)

These days, technology has taken over. Computers are the future. Large scale images — like the crowd of peasants in The Hunchback of Notre Dame — can be produced to awe– inspiring effect. Disney/Pixar's Toy Story was a watershed achievement, the first film to be entirely rendered by a computer.

The price of technology is not low, however, as more complicated scenes take all the more time to complete. In Pixar's latest film, A Bug's Life, for example, it sometimes took up to a 100 hours of computer time to render a single frame of animation. And it took three years just to complete the climatic Red Sea scene in The Prince of Egypt.

That latter film also highlights another recent trend in animation — competition from other studios to Disney's virtual monopoly. The result, so far, as been mixed. Releases like Warner Brother's Anastasia and Dreamworks' Antz were well received, but experts are still not sure if anyone saw A Quest for Camelot.

Walt Disney once said, "I'd rather entertain and hope that people learn, than teach and hope that people are entertained." In that quote lies the secret to animation's success — it is our break from life, from seriousness, from boredom. It's something undefinable, but maybe Julie Andrews, escaping in a world of waiter penguins, captured it best with the word, "supercalifragilisticexpialocious."

• Realizing that their shows were exactly the same, the two crews from CBS's "L.A. Doctors" and ABC's "The Practice" would join forces to create one mega–show, an animated show, called "Practicing L.A. Medicine," in which every character was either having a major operation or suing another character.

If TV were totally animated, then TV's most prestigious awards would have to be adjusted accordingly. And the Animated Emmy Award goes to...

• Homer Simpson for best actor in a comedy series. From week to week, Homer is undoubtedly one of the funniest characters on TV and has become a part of television history as a result of the "Simpsons." For a while, Bart may have been more popular, but Homer has always been funnier.

• Dot Warner for best actress. Dot delivers some of the sassiest and surprisingly refreshing lines each and every episode of "Animaniacs," one the most underrated cartoons ever. If for no other reason, she gets the nod for being a part of the best theme song on TV.

• Kenny of "South Park" for best supporting actor. Easily the most recognizable character on any show, one has to admire the hard work and perseverance this guy shows from episode to episode, to keep coming back to life like that. I think we all with Christmas comes early this year for Kenny's sake.

ter at the top where the Jacksonville Jaguars (7-2), Pittsburgh Steelers (6-3) and Tennessee Oilers (5-4) have coming together to battle for the division title and possibly wildcard positions. The Jaguars and the Oilers are both winners of their last two games.

Steve McNair and Eddie George have finally come on for the Oilers the way they were predicted to at the beginning of the season. The Jaguars have been solid all season long but now they face a tough task of playing the unpredictable Bucs this Sunday possibly without Mark Brunell, who is day-to-day with a groin injury.

The Steelers have been up and down this season, but they are coming off a huge Monday night win over the Packers. The Steelers will need to keep Kordell Stewart and Jerome Bettis playing well in order to fend off the emerging Oilers this weekend.

The AFC East also has a cluster at the top. But any real football guru knows that there are only two contenders in this division. The New York Jets (6-3) and the New England Patriots (5-4). The Miami Dolphins, who are tied with the Jets for the division lead are pretenders. With their whole team healthy the Dolphins came up with only a three-point victory over the Pats, who were missing all their wide receivers.

I am also convinced that as long as Vinny Testaverde is playing as the Jets starting QB the Jets will never lose again. Doug Flutie proved to be a fluke, when last week he came up with the inevitable bad performance.

Finally, let's talk picks. I enter this week 4-9, but it's time to turn the corner the with the NFL and improve this record.

We got six money makers this week include four no- brainers. Lets start with the Ravens, they're easily going to cover the one-point spread over San Diego. Why because San Diego is terrible.

The Green Bay game is also a no-brainer. The Pack is coming off a loss — when was the last time they lost two in a row — and they'll toast the 3-6 New York Giants. Miami is also a shoe-in to beat the Steve Buerline Panthers by three.

I've already admitted the Jets are the best team in the world, so they will easily cover the 6 1/2-point spread. The two toughies include the Eagles plus 4 1/2 over the Redskins in Washington.

My game-breaker of the week is the Falcons and 2 1/2 over the Young-less 49ers.

"This win puts us in the top half of the conference standings, but I think the split with George Washington and Rhode Island killed us. It also hurt them," UMass coach Bonnie Kenny said.

Last night's game against Rhody, was an image of what the entire season should have looked like. The Minutewomen did have a number of unforced errors, but they pushed URI into commit more errors. UMass also worked hard and showed a never-give-up attitude, which at times has been lacking this season.

"It wasn't very good volleyball out there tonight. We made so many unforced errors, and we practice ball handling an hour a day everyday and there is no excuse for this but at the same time they played very hard," Kenny said.

The Minutewomen pushed URI to the brink in the first game. UMass jumped out to a 13-3 lead in game one and almost had a repeat performance of the game four against GW. The Minutewomen allowed Rhody back into the game, as the game got as tight as 14-12, before Rebecca Hasson scored a crucial kill to end the game.

The Minutewomen carried that struggling play into the second game as they fell behind early, 10-2. But Hasson came through with probably her best hitting performance of the year. Hasson came up with four kills in that game, but it wasn't the number of kills, it was the timing. Her kills came one after another and fired up UMass. They cultivated the momentum and rattled off a 13-1 run en route to winning game two.

UMass battled through another competitive game in game three and fell 15-13, but what happened next shows how much this young team grew up over the course of a season.

The Minutewomen came out and set the tone for game four. After going down 2-0, they refocused themselves and retook the lead and never looked back. URI was able to pull to an 8-8 deadlock but UMass called on a year of experience, and came up with a 7-2 run to win the match.

The Minutewomen were led by a host of players. Hogancamp came up with her 16th consecutive double- double. She had 19 kills and 16 digs.

The Minutewomen also relied heavily on the play of Hasson. The Riverside, Calif. native tallied 11 kills, nine digs and six blocks.

Jill Meyers also tallied a double-double, tallying 18 kills and 12 digs. Freshman Setter Heather Holtsberg came through with another 55 assists to go along with her eight defensive digs.

Janeen DeMarte

The play on defense was also exceptional with six players registering at least eight defensive digs or more.

The Minutewomen next face Xavier and Dayton Next weekend in Ohio. UMass needs to win both games and would also need to receive some help from other teams in order to qualify for the A-10 tournament in Pittsburgh.

"If we show up [referring to Xavier and Dayton], and keep our emotional level up, we can play with them. I would much rather be the underdog, and upset someone," Hogancamp said.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Lymarie Llovet came through with four kills and eight big defensive digs in UMass' win over URI last night.

to take on No. 6 Penn State in the opening round of the NCAA tournament.

"We needed to get that recklessness back into her," Shea said of Johnston, who responded to her coach's challenge with three goals in the conference tournament and the eventual game-wining tally on Tuesday. "The past few days, she's had that fire back in her eyes again."

What makes her recent triumph even more special is the fact that she has bonded with the other UMass seniors while doing so. She, Kerry Lyons, Laura Phelan, Kate Putnam, and Vicky Browne have made a pact with each other — a pact which allows Johnston to do whatever she must to ensure a victory for the Minutewomen.

"I think the seniors set the tone for the younger players," Johnston said. "We've been [doing certain things like] holding hands during the national anthem. We made a promise to each other before the last four games that we're not losing."

Asking Johnston not to be aggressive and reckless would, more or less, be the equivalent of asking someone like Muhammed Ali not to say a word during a press conference. You just can't repress qualities which make an athlete effective and unique — qualities which make an athlete a proven winner.

second-chance points to their opponent, which could only muster a meager seven offensive rebounds.

"That's what we butter our bread with. So, if we're not doing that, then we're in trouble," said coach Bruiser Flint, whose squad out-rebounded Marathon Oil 53-27. "We're not the greatest shooting team in the world. We do execute a bit better this year than we did in the past, but we've got to rebound and play defense to be in every game, and in fact, that gives us a chance to win every night."

As members of one of the largest frontcourts in the Atlantic 10 conference, the Minutemen forwards are expected to out-rebound their opponents on a regular basis; however, when the team can receive clutch boards from its small forwards and guards (as it did last night), Flint's emphasis on rebounding seems even more worthwhile.

"He's been all over us in practice about going to the boards, especially the three-men and especially on the offensive end," junior forward Mike Babul (eight points, six rebounds) said of Flint. "If you see a shot go up, go up to the glass and try to tip it in."

After admitting that his fast-pace offense seemed hurried at times during the first exhibition game last week, Flint's new adjusted scheme worked to perfection in the opening moments, and late in the second half, creating easy jump shots for players like DePina and Winston Smith, who connected on key baskets down the stretch.

"We're going to play this way, we're going to play a little faster," said Flint, who hopes that once the kinks are removed from the new, up-tempo offense, the team's game will be more exciting for the fans and more effective for his quick guards. "We're going to be running up and down [the court] going crazy. Jonathon did a great job — no turnovers tonight, six assists."

Last night also marked the return of key UMass starter. After sitting out the last game with a hand injury, junior guard Monty Mack saw his first action of the season, playing 16 minutes and scoring nine points in his debut. Despite the absence, Mack felt that he did not suffer any ill-effects from the injury or lay-off.

"I don't think we were very rusty because we [already] came back to practice, and we practice hard and scrimmage," said Mack, who received a loud ovation from the fans when he took the floor for the first time. "So, I don't think I was rusty."

est," Mack explained. "I don't know if [Rhymer] was rusty, but he went to the boards and got a lot of rebounds for us, a lot of big boards."

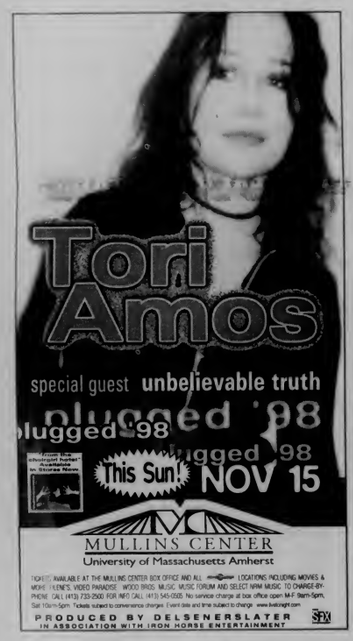
Small forward Mike Babul contributed to the team's 13-6 advantage in second chance points by conveniently tipping in several teammates' rim-rattlers on his way to an eight-point, six-board night.

"[Flint's] been all over us at practice about going to the boards, especially the three-men and especially at the offensive end," Babul said. "If you see the shot go up, go up to the glass and try to tip it in."

Amazingly, the Minutemen who staked the smallest claim to any post-game hoopla were those who will be expected to carry the load on Monday, when UMass hosts Niagara to start the regular season.

In an obvious effort to be kept healthy and rested for the season-opener, All-American candidate Lari Kelner played only 12 minutes and sat out most of the second half, although he put seven up on the scoreboard in his limited time. Frontcourt companion Ajmal Basit, who electrified Team Fokus with 16 points, scored only two in his 13 minutes of playing time.

"I was really pleased with the effort today, and I was pleased that some of the guys came off the bench and played," Flint said. "A lot of people played today."



And a lot of people played well, too.

Neely tries comeback

Bruins great attempts comeback to NHL

By Karen Russo
Associated Press

WILMINGTON — More than halfway into his first team practice since retiring from the Bruins in 1996, former forward Cam Neely received the puck and took the shot on net.

Clank. No matter that the puck hit the crossbar.

Or that Neely breathed heavier, weighed more and skated slower than in years past.

Cam Neely was back on the ice and that was enough.

Two years after the four-time NHL All Star prematurely retired from the game at 31, after scoring 395 goals and 299 assists in his 13-year-career, Neely was on the ice with his old team yesterday seeing if he could overcome the degenerative hip condition that sidelined his career.

So far, so good.

"I wish that my lungs felt as good as my hip," he said soon after leaving the ice at the Ristuccia Center, wearing a sweaty Bruins practice jersey.

He always wondered if he could come back.

After the 45-minute practice session, Neely recalled how the pain was oneday unbearable he couldn't sleep.

Neely's return follows intensive work with a physical therapist who is helping to lengthen the muscles and tendons around his hip and break down some of the scar tissue surrounding his hip socket. The rink was filled with media and teammates excited about Neely's possible comeback.

Bruins veteran Ray Bourque, one of three remaining players who played with Neely, said that he was watching the 1988 playoff tapes where Neely "was scoring all over the place" when Neely called Tuesday to tell him of his return.

"I feel this is important for him to try," Bourque said. "The way he went out wasn't the way he wanted to. If it works out for him, it's going to be a big bonus for everybody."

Young players who never skated with Neely, like 19-year-old Joe Thornton — the Bruins' 1997 first-round draft pick — are looking forward to playing with the star.

"I grew up watching highlights of him on television," Thornton said.

In the 10 seasons he played for the Bruins, it was hard to miss Neely, who was as much of a presence in front of the net as he was in the community.

Neely helped to create the Cam Neely Foundation at the New England Medical Center, a home for families of patients with cancer. The disease killed Neely's parents.

While playing with an injured knee, Neely scored 50 goals in his first 44 games of 1993-94. Only Wayne Gretzky has scored 50 goals in fewer games.

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Don't forget to equip yourself with the basics today. Be sure to take necessary precautions when choosing to face an unfamiliar situation.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You may become confused for awhile today, thanks to the behavior of a friend that doesn't seem to suit any one given situation. Watch and learn.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may be driven to a rather dramatic, "last ditch" decision today. Take care that you don't commit to anything that is carved in stone.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — It'll be up to you to do what is necessary for a friend or loved one who is under an unusual amount of stress today. By all means, stay calm!

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — It may seem as the day begins that you've been awarded a little extra time to get something done. However, take care that you don't take too much time!

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You may be letting an opportunity slip through your fingers today without even knowing it. Be sure to grab all the chances you can.

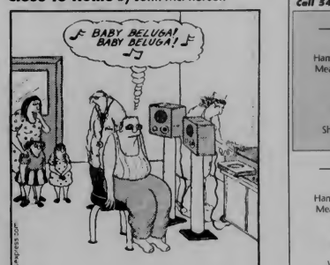
TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You'll be tempted to ask a few questions that you know will raise the blood of those in control today. Are you ready for a fight?

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Now is no time to play it safe. A more daring, aggressive approach can benefit you as well as those around you today. Take a chance.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You'll finally have the opportunity you've been looking for today, but are you fully prepared for it? Be sure you're where you need to be.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You are likely to be affected quite profoundly by the affairs of someone you hardly know. This will once again highlight your connection to the world.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You should be able to bring together many people with remarkable talents who are willing to work in unison to make one of your dreams come true.



LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You are ready to admit to something today which may have proved to be embarrassing for you in the recent past. It's a good day to "come clean.

Quote of the Day

"Take the best sex you've ever had, multiply it by a thousand and you're still nowhere near it."

As NFL turns corner, injuries plague hopefuls

Week 10 in the National Football League is in the books, and things are foggier than ever.

Teams who looked poised to run away with their respective division titles suddenly lost their starting quarterbacks or lost another key member of their teams.

Paul Teves on NFL

The biggest action occurred in the NFC Central, which thus far this season has belonged to the Minnesota Vikings (8–1) and the Green Bay Packers (6–3). Both the Packers and the Vikings were hit with bad news this Monday.

The Packers lost another running back on the depth chart, when they were told Travis Jervey is out for the season with a broken foot. The Packers are now without both Jervey and Dorsey Levens who was lost earlier in the season to a broken leg. Raymont Harris must now carry the load on the ground for the Pack, in a running game which has struggled all year.

The Vikings had their worst Sunday of the season when they lost their starting quarterback, Randall Cunningham, who injured his knee, but his replacement Brad Johnson also went down with a broken thumb on his throwing hand. Sources for the Vikings said that Cunningham could play, but that the likely starter will be Jay Fielder. Who? Lucky for Fielder the Vikes are facing the Cincinnatti Bengals (2– 7) who couldn't beat a Pop Warner team.

The other teams in this division are all battling for at best a wildcard spot. The Tampa Bay Buccaneers (4–5) have to make a move in the division soon if they plan to be a factor. Trent Dilfer will also need to stop giving away football games they should win.

Whatever slim shot the Chicago Bears (3–6) might have had at the playoffs is gone with the loss of Curtis Enis. Enis is out for the season.

The NFC West has two major pieces of news coming out. First, Kerry Collins is scheduled to make his first start for the New Orleans Saints (4–5). The 'Aints are losers of two in a row, and are looking for Collins to pull them out of hell's fire. For Collins it will be interesting to see how he responds to action after such a long layoff and how he responds to the pressure that he put on himself due to the DUI arrest.

The San Francisco 49ers (7–2) and the Atlanta Falcons (7– 2) are tied atop the West for first, and meet for the second time this season. The Niners won the first game, but this time San Fran will be without leading candidate for the NFL MVP, Steve Young. Young was injured last weekend (ribs), and ir listed as questionable for Sunday's game with the Falcons, who are winners of their last two.

The news out of the NFC East, still the worst division in the NFL, is that there are only two teams still competing for the title. The Dallas Cowboys (6–3) and the Arizona Cardinals (5–4) will meet this weekend for the division lead, but unfortunately for the Cardinals they do not have Rod Tidwell playing in this game. Look for the Cowboys to pull away in this division of really bad clubs.

The New York Giants (3–6) are losers of two straight and will not win this week against the Packers no matter how many running backs the Pack loses this season.

The AFC took some serious injury hits this week, and it could seriously affect the outcomes of some of this weekend's games.

The major news in the conference is coming out of the AFC West. The Denver Broncos (9–0) have a good shot of winning the division and doing it in undefeated style, but if they were to lose this could be the week for several reasons.

The Broncos lost quarterback John Elway, who will be replaced by Bubby Brister. Brister has played well, but it has been against the likes of Philadelphia Eagles (2–7) and the Washington Redskins (1–8). This week he faces the Kansas City Chiefs (4–5).

Although the Chiefs have a bad record and have lost four in a row, they are playing at Arrowhead Stadium, and the Chiefs benched Elvis Grbac this week, who is 1–4 as a starter this season, in favor of Rich Gannon, who is 3–1 this season.

The Oakland Raiders (6–3) and the Seattle Seahawks (5–4) will also be involved in what should prove to be a huge match. This game could do one of two things. It could either increase Oakland's lead or tighten up a already tight division. Jeff George could be a big part of the decision in this one due to the fact that he might not play.

Field hockey clinches NCAA berth

By Casey Kane

Massachusetts field hockey coach Patty Shea had been waiting for Erica Johnston to explode. Shea knew the damage Johnston, a senior forward, was capable of inflicting on the opposition; she was just waiting for it.

The first dose of Johnston's scoring power was on display last weekend, when she scored three goals to help the Minutewomen to their third straight Atlantic 10 tournament title.

Tuesday, Johnston and company defeated Patriot League champ Holy Cross, 2–0, at Richard F. Garber Field to earn a spot in the NCAA tournament.

The Minutewomen will play Penn State, the team they met in the first round of last year's tournament, Saturday afternoon in Princeton, N.J.

Senior forward Erica Johnston and the Massachusetts field hockey team gained a berth in the NCAA tourney after defeating Holy Cross 2–0 in a game played Tuesday.

"We needed to get Erica back with the recklessness she plays with," Shea said. "That's her personality. It's a good recklessness."

Johnston gave UMass all the offense it would need with the first goal of the game with 22:37 remaining in the first half. On a break toward the Crusader goal, Johnston brought the ball in from the left side, worked around a pair of defenders, before beating the goalie in the middle of the circle.

Laura Phelan

"I just took it in from the left side," Johnston said. "In practice, we've been working on pulling to the right. A lot of times I was choking going to the left. That change makes a difference. Then I just popped it from the top."

Massachusetts got a little insurance when Laura Phelan knocked home the team's second goal 12 minutes before halftime. Using a fake by Anke Bruemmer on a penalty corner, Phelan let loose on a shot to the backboard of the Holy Cross cage that seemed to frighten a Crusader defender.

Zowie Tucker

The goal came on only the second UMass offensive penalty of the game. For the rest of the game, however, the Minutewomen terrorized Holy Cross inside its circle, creating seven more corner opportunities.

The Crusaders, meanwhile, had a much harder time getting close to the UMass circle. Minutewoman goalie Zowie Tucker faced only one corner and only one shot.

"I'm confident in our defense," Johnston said. "I have the expectation now that nothing is going to get down there."

That's says a lot about not only the UMass defensive unit — which starts two freshmen and two seniors alongside the senior Phelan, but the team in general.

"One of the biggest things is that they have started to believe in themselves," Shea said.

Not only that, but Johnston, Phelan and the team's three other seniors — Kate Putnam, Vicky Browne and Kerry Lyons — have made a pact with each other to give every effort possible.

"I think the seniors set the tone for the younger players," Johnston said. "We've been [doing certain things like] holding hands during the national anthem. We made a promise to each other before the last four games that we're not losing."

Now, the Minutewomen must turn their attention to making that promise hold true in the NCAA tournament.

"We need to win our next game in the tournament," Shea said. "That's our next step. We need to get a win out of that."

Johnston feels that the Minutewoman seniors have the necessary ingredients to put together a successful tournament showing.

"This is it. This is our last year," Johnston said. "We have the confidence and the experience. And I think we know what it takes. In the last couple of weeks we've gotten the kinks worked out. We're really solid now."

Johnston gets old fire back

By Aaron Soykin
Collegian Staff

It's been a challenging year for senior forward Erica Johnston. That's why both she and her teammates couldn't help but enjoy her spectacular post–season play during the Atlantic 10 tournament and Tuesday's NCAA Play–In game against Holy Cross.

When she streaked into the Crusader defensive circle with her old form, faking the defenders out of their shoes, and unleashing a spectacular off–balance goal, everyone watching knew that she had finally come into her own again.

As a junior in 1997, the frontline star of the Massachusetts field hockey team earned some impressive credentials along with her 24 goals, and was named the Atlantic 10 regular– season and tournament MVP.

After such a successful junior campaign, her coaches knew it would be difficult for her to reassert her domination. After all, she had become a marked player, and to make things more difficult, her team began to depend on her prolific scoring ability.

When she began this season recuperating from a concussion suffered in the opening game, she endured her first set–back of the fall. When she finally returned to the line–up, she found a different team style — one which utilized a more balanced scoring attack to compensate for her absence. So Johnston did what any consummate team player would do in her situation. She toned down her explosive and flamboyant style, and played unselfishly within the team–oriented offense.

But now that the Minutewomen are in the thick of an intense post–season, UMass coach Patty Shea called upon Johnston to do something special in a pressure situation. She asked her senior star to return to her fiery, old form and make sure that enough goals were scored so the team could live to play another day... and by the way, that other day will be Saturday, when the Minutewomen travel to Princeton, N.J.

DePina, offense all ready to go

By Aaron Soykin
Collegian Staff

Although Rafael Cruz may have been the hero guard last week in the first exhibition game of the 1998–99 season, last night belonged to Johnathon DePina.

The Massachusetts men's basketball team has a new budding star in its backcourt. The 5–foot–9 feisty, point guard from South Boston scored nine points, handed out six assists, grabbed seven rebounds and sealed the game with a steal in the final minute to ensure a 76–72 victory over Marathon Oil last night at the William D. Mullins Center.

After playing a bit tentatively at times during the opening preseason game last week, DePina seemed extremely confident last night. Not only did he wrap up the win for his Minutemen, but he also committed no turnovers and connected on four of seven shots during his second consecutive exhibition start at the point guard position.

"I know what to expect out there, and I know what I can do out there, and what not to do," said DePina, who admitted that he felt more comfortable during his second start. "So I feel a lot better. Last week's game I didn't feel that comfortable, but today I felt a lot better about the way we played altogether and [about] the way I played."

Despite jumping out to a 12–2 advantage to open the game, the Minutemen struggled late in the first half, relinquishing their lead with 4:29 remaining in the frame. Although both teams battled back–and–forth in the second half, UMass managed to pull away in the waning moments behind its strong team defense and rebound domination. The Minutemen also yielded a minuscule six

Every player gets a punch in

By Seth Koenig

If the most valuable player must be chosen only from the winning team, there would be no clear–cut favorite at the end of the final preseason game for the Massachusetts basketball team.

If the choice was made with all participants in mind, the UMass opponent, Marathon Oil, would have boasted back– up guard Erwin Claggett as the MVP. Claggett didn't miss a three–pointer until there was 11:18 to go in the second half and ended the contest nailing six of his eight attempts from beyond the arc.

Even the man Claggett substituted for, Lazell Durden, might have made a case for the honor, hitting four of his six shots from "downtown," en route to a 14 point afternoon.

"There's some great shooters on the other team," UMass guard Charlton Clarke said, describing the Marathon Oil snipers.

No one player from UMass, however, could be set aside as the reason the Minutemen went to the locker room with a 76–72 victory, showing great team balance and depth.

Forward Chris Kirkland contributed the most to the home team's offensive production with 12 points, but coach Bruiser Flint must have been pleased to see that Kirkland was not on an island, as he was followed closely by two players with nine points, two more with eight, and another couple with seven.

One of the nine point–scorers, Jonathan DePina, led the squad with seven rebounds and six assists from his point guard position, showing incredible versatility.

DePina's backcourt mate, Rafael Cruz, added to his six points with four assists and an impressive two three–pointers out of three tries, doing his part to nullify the long–distance production from Marathon Oil.

Ronnell Blizzard, a red–shirt freshman from Waterbury, Conn., scored his seven points in dramatic fashion and often at crucial times, perhaps setting the rhythm for the UMass offense late in the second half, when the game was in question.

Even the two Minutemen who were forced to sit out last week's exhibition match–up against Team Fokus with injuries managed to affect the game. Last season's starting shooting guard, Monty Mack, entered the game to a warm Mullins Center welcome to pour in nine points when the team needed a shot in the arm. Kitwana Rhymer had five rebounds to show for his tenacious play under the baskets.

"I don't think I was rusty, to be honest,

Spikers close at Cage with win

By Paul Teves

All in one night the Massachusetts volleyball team (14–14, 11–7 in the Atlantic 10), beat the University of Rhode Island, 3–1, beat St. Bonaventure, whose program was terminated, and set itself up for two crucial Atlantic 10 contests against the current leaders of the conference, Xavier and Dayton.

The Minutewomen disposed of the URI Rams last night, who were ahead of UMass in the conference standings heading into the game.

This was not an issue for UMass before the game. They entered knowing that it would be their last game this season in front of the home crowd at Curry Hicks Cage, and fought hard en route to beating Rhody 15–12, 15–11, 15–15, 15–10.

"This is a perfect win. The words 'Rhode Island,' that was enough preparation and motivation for us in this match," junior co–captain Kari Hogancamp said. "This is a big rivalry for us."

With the win over Rhode Island the Minutewomen improve to 10–7 in the conference, but they also receive the win from the forfeited game against St. Bonaventure, which was suppose to be played Friday at Curry Hicks. Heading into next weekend the Minutewomen will carry an 11–7 conference mark.

New Israeli housing may harm peace process

WASHINGTON (AP) — Israel's decision to begin construction of a new Jewish neighborhood on the outskirts of Jerusalem is a "bad decision that harms the peace process," the State Department said yesterday.

"We're against this decision, and it would have been better if it had not been taken because it undermines the climate of trust and confidence between the parties," spokesman James P. Rubin said.

Even so, the U.S. criticism of Israel's publication of bids for the construction of 1,025 homes at Har Homa was limited to the impact State Department officials said it might have on peacemaking between Israel and the Palestinians.

Rubin did not address whether the Clinton administration considers the site to be in Jerusalem or on the West Bank. The Oslo agreements between Israel and the Palestinians do not prohibit settlements while turning over some of the West Bank to the Palestinian Authority.

CNN anchorman Arnett back in the saddle again

NEW YORK (AP) — Four months after nearly losing his job in the fallout over CNN's retracted story about nerve gas use in Vietnam, Peter Arnett is finally returning to the air.

The star international correspondent has filmed six reports on the civil war in Algeria that will be shown soon on CNN, a network executive said.

Arnett hasn't been on CNN since a follow-up report in June on Operation Tailwind. He narrated CNN's original Tailwind story in May that alleged the deadly gas sarin was used by U.S. forces in a 1970 mission to hunt down American defectors during the Vietnam War.

The story infuriated the military, and CNN concluded after an investigation that it could not be proven. Arnett successfully fought for his job after arguing his role in reporting the story was minimal.

Since then, CNN hasn't exactly rushed to put Arnett back on the air.

"It was mutually agreed that we needed to let some time pass and find some appropriate stories for him to cover," CNN spokesman Steve Haworth told reporters.

Majors fair a success with students; advising services happy with outcome

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Majors Fair, sponsored by the Pre–Majors Advising Services, took place last Wednesday in the Student Union Ballroom.

The fair included an array of advisors and faculty heads, serving as leading experts and advisors in their majors.

Theresa DiCiocco, a sophomore Italian studies major, felt the fair was a great opportunity for students to explore many majors.

"I think it's a great opportunity for students to explore the different majors at the university," DiCiocco said. "This way they can broaden their horizons and have the chance to contact their advisors for the first time."

Susan Machala, academic advisor of Undergraduate Advising and Academic Support Center (UAASC), feels the fair turnout reflected the convenience of bringing all departmental advisors together.

"It's more of a commitment to make an appointment with an advisor," Machala said. "The Majors Fair allows students to break the ice between the professors and themselves, and realize what they want to come back and learn more about."

Machala feels many students do not realize where the available resources are or even how to go about looking for them.

"At such a big university, people tend to think that they need to remain anonymous," Machala said. "It is to one's best advantage to have the broadest array of resources to consult if they only choose to take advantage of them."

UMass professor Robert Rothstein, Director of the Slavic and East European Studies Department, has attended every fair since he has been at the University.

"This is a great way for students to get an idea of the riches available to them at such a large and diverse campus like UMass," Rothstein said.

Other students like Helena Horak, a freshman Pre–Medical student, felt that the evening's showcase was very informative in helping narrow down future opportunities.

"I've always been interested in Biology," Horak said. "I found this evening to be very informative in helping me focus on a particular path I can take in keeping my options open."

Since pre–registration period started yesterday, Machala and others at the Pre–Advising Services feel that students should schedule an appointment. The Pre–Advising Services is located on the sixth floor of Goodell.

"We want to give students the opportunity to make the best choices available for them, but they need to take the initial step in seeking advising help," Machala said.

Graduate Employment Office advocating UM childcare center

By Stacey Shackford and Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The morning is a rush for many people, but it was literally a race yesterday as part of an event hosted by the Graduate Employment Office (GEO) on the Student Union steps at the University of Massachusetts.

"The race is on for childcare" was a staged competition depicting the every day obstacles single parents face as students juggling responsibilities. Contestants competed to see who could get through a typical day as a single parent student the fastest.

Graduate student David Hammer was one of four students dressed as cheerleaders, chanting "Affordable, flexible, child care now."

"The purpose of the event was to get the word out and let people know what's going on in a fun and theatrical way," Hammer said.

But Hammer also stressed that the situation was far from fun for those involved.

"The reason It is so Important [that the child care center is established] for January is that in Massachusetts, welfare benefits for studenss run out in December," Hammer said.

One of the speakers at the event, School of Education graduate student Jennifer Fasulo, also emphasized the issues facing students on welfare. According to Fasulo, in the span of one year there has been an 88 percent decline in enrollment of low income students and student parents because of welfare reform.

"This is a state of emergency," Fasulo said. "But the administration does not even track the number of low income students."

Fasulo shared the story of international student families that had to send their children back to their home countries because they could not afford child care in the Amherst area.

"I can't imagine how difficult it must be for those who come to this country with the intent to better their lives and they are not able to afford child care," said Ana–Maria Campos, a fine arts graduate fellow and teacher assistant.

Throughout the rally, members of GEO challenged the administration to stop "waffling" and make a decision about child care.

Chancellor David K. Scott was unavailable for comment, but Associate Chancellor Sue Pearson said he is still in the process of evaluating the proposal for space.

"We would all like to see a flexible child care center open by this spring," she said. "At the moment the big question is location."

She said the School of Education has also expressed interest in the Skinner Hall space for an expansion of the lab school.

Bailey Jackson, Dean of the School of Education, was unavailable for comment.

But GEO president Emily LaBarber–Twarog questions the Chancellor's commitment to child care.

"This Is the closest we've gotten to commitment, but they're backing off," she said. "We've delivered a proposal, a clear need, and money...by backing off, they're going back on a commitment they claim to have."

Female hit by car listed as critical

University of Massachusetts student, Kerry Hines, 25, was listed in critical condition in the intensive care unit of Baystate Medical Center yesterday after a car struck her Wednesday afternoon, according to spokespeople from Baystate Medical Center and the University.

According to police, Appollos Ihedigbo, 52, a University employee living in Amherst, was driving south on Infirmary Way when he hit Hines in front of Hills House. There is no crosswalk directly in front of Hills House.

Hines was taken by ambulance to the Baystate Medical Center's Trauma Center, said Kay Scanlan, University spokesperson. Ihedigbo did not sustain any injuries.

Scanlan said there was some damage to the front hood and windshield of Ihedigbo's car.

Hines, a senior at the University from Randolph, resides locally at 81 Presidential Apartments, Amherst.

UMass police and state police accident reconstruction team are continuing to investigate the accident.

As of last night, no charges had been filed in the case.

Plan considered to permanently eject Hussein

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Buoyed by Arab criticism of Iraq, the Clinton administration said yesterday that Saddam Hussein had isolated himself and must reverse course. "We're not playing games," said Defense Secretary William Cohen as U.S. military preparations proceeded.

Eight Arab foreign ministers issued a statement in Qatar saying that Iraq's continuing refusal to submit to U.N. weapons inspectors could have serious consequences for the Arab country.

Citing the statement as evidence of "near unanimity" in the Arab world, State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said, "The U.S. feels this is a pretty good indicator of where the key Gulf countries stand on the latest crisis."

Rubin dismissed a demand by Sen. Arlen Specter, R–Pa., that President Clinton seek Congress' approval before ordering any attack on Iraq.

The president has "inherent authority" to use force and also was authorized by Congress' approval in the past of U.N. Security Council resolutions bearing on Iraq's concealment of weapons, Rubin said.

Specter had written Clinton that "use of force by your administration without prior congressional authorization would be another major step in undermining the sole authority of Congress to declare war."

Sen. Richard G. Lugar, R–Ind., said military strikes were likely. He encouraged the administration to consider an all–out follow–up campaign to remove Saddam from power — a plan, he acknowledged, that probably would require U.S. ground troops.

And if Saddam cannot be removed without targeting and killing him? "I suspect, then, he will have to be killed," Lugar replied. There was no direct reaction from the administration. Rubin said only that "any use of force would be to degrade his capacity to develop weapons of mass destruction and to threaten his neighbors."

In another development, Deputy Secretary of State Strobe Talbott hinted that if Clinton decided to use force there could be a series of attacks on Iraq.

"We have thought well beyond hour one, day one and week one," he said during an appearance at the Brookings Institution, a Washington research group. "There are lots of ways we can make sure he loses on day one and thereafter."

Talbott said Clinton had not made a final decision. "This crisis can end peacefully," he said.

Speaking in Norfolk, Va., aboard the Bataan, a Marine Corps helicopter assault ship, Cohen said the U.S. message is for Iraq to comply with the U.N. inspections commission. "A failure to comply could result in a military operation and we're hoping that doesn't take place," he said.

Cohen added in reference to

Sicari, 22, receives life in murder of Jeffrey Curley, 10

CAMBRIDGE — A man was convicted yesterday of murdering a 10–year–old boy who was lured into a car with the promise of a new bicycle, then suffocated, molested, entombed in concrete and dumped in a river.

In a case that nearly returned the death penalty to Massachusetts, a jury found Salvatore Sicari, 22, guilty of first–degree murder in the slaying of Jeffrey Curley. Sicari got the mandatory sentence of life in prison without parole.

Prosecutors said Sicari and another man, 23–year–old Charles Jaynes, lured the fifth–grader into Jaynes' Cadillac in 1997, promising him $50 and a new bike.

When the child rebuffed their sexual advances, the two smothered him with a gasoline–soaked rag, prosecutors said.

Jeffrey's body was taken to Jaynes' New Hampshire apartment, where both men allegedly molested the corpse. They stuck the body in a cement–filled container and dumped it in a Maine river, where it was found days later, police said.

Sicari's lawyer blamed Jaynes, saying his client only witnessed the killing and helped cover up the crime. Jaynes goes on trial later this month.

The case prompted cries last year for a return of the death penalty in Massachusetts. The measure failed by one vote in the Legislature.

Choking back sobs, Jeffrey's mother, Barbara, described her youngest son as a curious and mischievous boy who was "always delightful and full of life."

Saddam: "He wants to get inspectors out so they can't delve into what they're doing behind closed doors."

And yet, the Pentagon chief said, "We're not seeking to go to war. We're seeking to avoid it. All he has to do is comply. The choice is his.

The Arab statement, by Egypt, Syria, Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates, Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, declared, "The Iraqi government is held responsible for any consequences that might arise from its refusal to back down from its decision to expel the U.N. weapons inspectors."

And, the communique said, such an Iraqi decision "will expose the innocent Iraqi people to more miseries and tragedies." The foreign ministers gave no indication their governments intend to participate in a military operation against Iraq. Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat said, meanwhile, he was optimistic the crisis could be resolved with diplomacy.

"I hope and urge that there will not be an attack against Iraq," Arafat told The Jerusalem Post. Peace in the Middle East will be negatively affected by a U.S. attack."

Cohen and other administration officials have tried to rally Arab states to support the United States, particularly in the event of a military strike.

Use of bases in Saudi Arabia, for instance, could simplify the logistics of an air assault. Still, U.S. bombers can fly from Britain, a staunch ally, and there is ample American firepower in the Persian Gulf area and on the way for the United States to act unilaterally.

New class for motivated students

By Kiera Meehan
Collegian Correspondent

Students will be getting a real education in getting a job with a class being offered next semester.

The Office of National Scholarship Advisement (ONSA) will be offering a new class next semester called "Global Issues for the 21st Century."

The class, created by ONSA Director Linda Nolan, is designed to give students "the opportunity to broaden their educational outlook, help prepare mock interviews, enhance their public speaking and leadership skills, and also engage them in community service," Nolan said.

It is a one to three credit course, by arrangement. Students do not need to be in the honors program, but should be juniors or seniors with a 3.75 GPA or higher.

"I am astounded at the talent that exists on this campus...I think there's a lot of talent here and I'm anxious to promote it," said University of Massachusetts Fulbright Scholarship advisor Paul Berube.

Berube is one of the several advisors who work with ONSA. ONSA, located within the Honors Program, was designed to help UMass students who are interested in applying for national scholarship awards.

ONSA provides assistance for students applying for the following scholarships: Fulbright Grants, Mellon Fellowships, Rhodes Scholarships, Glamour Top Ten Awards, National Security Education Program Scholarships, Truman Scholarships, James Madison Fellowships, Phi Kappa Phi Fellowships, USA Today All-USA Awards, Marshall Scholarships, Public Policy and International Affairs Fellowships, and the Elie Wiesel Ethics Essay Contest.

"I think that UMass students have an excellent chance of winning any of these highly esteemed awards. We're there to help with essays, editing, soliciting letters of recommendation and putting together complete applications, and help prepare for interviews," said English professor John Nelson.

In addition to teaching, Nelson is the President of Phi Kappa Phi honor society, which offers 7,000 graduate fellowships for first year study in any American graduate school.

Students interested in taking this course or applying for a national scholarship, should contact Linda Nolan in 504 Goodell at 545-2483.

Chilean pres. on trial for murder

By Maureen Johnson
Associated Press

LONDON — Lawyers seeking to have Chile's former dictator Augusto Pinochet tried on charges that his military government committed genocide, murder and torture have put their case succinctly: That's no way for any head of state to behave.

At the end of a six-day appeal hearing yesterday before Britain's highest court, all that was clear, however, is that it's not that simple.

Pinochet's lawyers argued in the House of Lords that a British law giving former heads of state immunity from prosecution is sufficiently sweeping to protect even Adolf Hitler. They acknowledged that may be morally regrettable, but insisted it's the law.

However, they conceded that among the several thousand allegations of secret police brutality during Pinochet's 1973-90 rule, a Spanish judge seeking the general's extradition had included one case dated after 1988, when Britain signed onto a convention making torture an offense anywhere.

The head of the five-judge tribunal, Lord Justice Gordon Slynn, called the case "very difficult" and gave no indication when the verdict would be delivered.

Lawyers arguing Spain's case had appealed a ruling by England's High Court holding that Pinochet's Oct. 16 arrest was illegal because a 1978 British act gives former heads of state immunity from prosecution for deeds committed in office.

They contended that some crimes are so horrific as to defy immunity.

"Torture, hostage-taking and crimes against humanity are conduct which international law has forbidden unequivocally throughout the period that we are looking at," lawyer Christopher Greenwood told the judges.

A Chilean government report says Pinochet's deeds included responsibility for the deaths or disappearances of some 3,000 people at the hands of secret police after he toppled an elected Marxist, President Salvador Allende.

Ahmad discusses Indian nuclear testing

By Rebecca Sabla
Collegian Correspondent

Eqbal Ahmad, professor emeritus at Hampshire College, gave an emotional and informative lecture at Hampshire College last week on the role of nuclear weapons in India and Pakistan.

His Nov. 5 lecture entitled, "Fire on the Mountain: South Asia after the Nuclear Tests," and sponsored by the Five College Program in Peace and World Security Studies, examined India and Pakistan both before and after the nuclear testing initiated by India on May 11, 1998.

Ahmad, who was raised in Pakistan, has had years of experience in the international field. He has been involved in the Civil Rights Movement, and the anti-war movement. In addition, he has taught at Cornell University, the University of Chicago and Hampshire College. Ahmad has also been at the Institute for Policy Studies and was a founding member of the Transnational Institute in Amsterdam.

He said when India decided to test nuclear weapons, it destroyed an image of peace and non-violence that had been respected and imitated throughout the world for more than half a century. Pakistan, by responding to India's provocations, has suffered sanctions that have negatively affected the government and the economy.

Ahmad continued by explaining why India decided to test the weapons. He explained that through its policies, the United States has made nuclear weapons the "primary element of projection of power."

He went on to say that throughout the entire period of disarmament, the United States was really ensuring that only a few select countries were acquiring weapons. Not only did the United States look away while Israel developed its nuclear weapons, said Ahmad, it also "provided Israel with the most modern, advanced delivery capabilities."

In 1995, after a three-year period of naval expansion, the United States invited India to participate in joint exercises in the Indian Ocean, Ahmad said. This move only "wet their appetite," and the Indians' perception of nuclear weapons as a symbol of power was "augmented by American policies." Nuclear weapons had become a "currency of power" to the Indian government officials.

Using Japan and Germany as examples, Ahmad said, "for the first time in the history of the world, there has been the delinking of military and economic power. Given the delinking, what the hell are the Indians and Pakistanis going for?"

Throughout the lecture, Ahmad also focused on the dangers and misconceptions of nuclear weapons. Henry Kissinger once said, according to Ahmad, "nuclear weapons are the modern equivalent of raising the flag." But Ahmad argued that we "should not take nuclear weapons seriously as a currency of power." It is a "stupid, Kissingerian view of the world," he said.

"The weapon is evil," said Ahmad. "It shouldn't exist. It should be eliminated globally."

He said nuclear weapons are a risk to the world and the American ideology that "nuclear weapons are a currency of power" endangers everyone.

Ahmad urged peace between India and Pakistan and said that their positions "cannot be moved without international pressure. Pressure must be put on both countries."

"There is a risk of nuclear holocaust between the Indians and Pakistanis as long as the Indians and Pakistanis remain enemies," he said.

Ahmad's lecture was met with approval from students and community members. Lauren Goldrich, a first-year student at Hampshire College, thought Ahmad's lecture "was really informative as well as frightening. The lecture was a necessary, eye-opening scare. It was excellent because he was so passionate about it."

Seth Levin, a sophomore at Amherst College felt similarly.

"I think Ahmad, being a very real presence at Hampshire College and in the Five College community, helped the impact of his speech," he said. "He is an essential member of our community and that helped emphasize the importance of what he was talking about and the extreme urgency of the matter."

Honduras rebuilds with the world's help

By Elay O. Aguilar
Associated Press

TEGUCIGALPA, Honduras — Law students dug with shovels yesterday alongside roaring earth-moving equipment, trying to rid Honduras' capital of thick layers of mud left by Hurricane Mitch. In Honduras and Nicaragua, where nearly 10,000 people died in the storm's fury, much of the recovery effort now involves sheer hard work by thousands of ordinary citizens.

"We will rebuild," insisted Francis Juarez, a law student whose hands were blistered from shoveling the foul-smelling black muck. An 8-foot-high watermark on the wall behind her showed how high the Choluteca River rose on Oct. 30-31. The river normally flows two blocks away and 15 feet below.

"I had never seen my country like this," said Hector Duran, an engineering student standing in 2-foot-deep mud. "I did not realize the damage was so bad. If we all make an effort we will come out ahead."

In a radio broadcast yesterday, President Carlos Flores Facusse appealed to the United States and other countries to increase aid to his stricken nation and forgive its debts.

But he also called on his countrymen to "redouble your efforts and your work to rebuild the country as rapidly as possible."

"The time has come for us to jointly face the apocalyptic reality of our villages and cities...and try to create a Honduras that is renewed, vigorous, modern and better," Flores Facusse said.

Despite the recovery efforts, the nation's top business group urged the government to extend a curfew and state of emergency imposed Nov. 2 to try to prevent looting.

Without unlimited police authority to arrest and jail suspects, "there will be chaos, desperation and more robberies," said Rigoberto Stefan, vice president of the Honduran Private Enterprise Council.

Meanwhile, aid continued to arrive from across the globe. The Rome-base U.N. World Food Program announced it would distribute more than 100,000 tons of rice, corn, fish and oil over the next six months in the hurricane-hit countries.

Common Wealth?

It is a short walk between Bartlett and Goodell but one worth taking. Begin on the 5th floor of the administrative Goodell Building, right outside the Honors Program. Observe the new carpet, space-age chairs, the lingering scent of new paint. Now, teleport to the academic realm of Bartlett and notice the cracked tiles, dilapidated desks, and over-ambitious heating system. What the hell is going on here? Why do some students have state of the art labs to work in while the English department is lucky to have a single PC in the lobby of Bartlett?

Elitism. The practice of elevating one body of people above another. Here, now, at UMass, elitism is rearing its ugly head again. Administrators scramble to hide their heads when the accusations fly, but in the situation of the Commonwealth College Proposal, their escape will hopefully be stopped.

"Currently, there are around 325 minority students here at UMass that are completely qualified to be enrolled in the Honors Program, but choose not to."

Bron Tamulis

Formerly the Honors College, the Commonwealth College is the notion that this University needs academic and residential segregation for its "top" students. Don't worry, you're right: there won't be any mention of this directly in the proposal. It takes a decoding process to discover the insidious nature of the Commonwealth College, and its distinct lack of common wealth. All the information used to write this column can be found in three documents, which are available to the public if you seek them out.

Alright. Now we've got to delve into the language of the documents themselves. Bear with it, it is not easy though the information is rather interesting. "[The goal of the Commonwealth College is] to provide a residential academic experience with an innovative, dynamic interdisciplinary liberal arts and science curriculum, and faculty and mentors who place a high value on teaching and learning in an environment that maximizes active student involvement and student–faculty interaction." Blah, blah, blah. This means virtually nothing unless you analyze the words "residential academic experience" and read on to discover just what the implications are. What is explained later is that Honors students will be "encouraged but not required" to live on specific floors in Orchard Hill as incoming freshmen.

For those who do opt to live in segregated housing, they will be forced to move off the floors when their first year is over. Where will they go? According to Norm Aitken, Deputy Provost, Honors students would of course be assisted in their attempt to move elsewhere. He explained that if one or two "normal" students were still living in a room that was requested by Honors students, they would be forced to move. Remember that pesky word elitism? Here it is again, flourishing and well.

Here's some more feel–good legalese: "[The goal of the Commonwealth College is] to develop effective recruitment and retention strategies to attract and retain students of high academic ability from diverse socio–economic, ethnic, and racial groups." Thank you, Chancellor Scott, for recognizing this particular area as one of paramount concern. But realize this too: students from diverse socio–economic and racial backgrounds do not compare on SAT and GPA scales because the tests have been proven time and again to be racially biased and poor indicators of academic ability. Currently, there are about 325 minority students here at UMass that are completely qualified to be enrolled in the Honors Program, but choose not to be. Many students, myself included, choose not to enroll in the Honors Program because they recognize the stink of elitism. Chancellor Scott, your standards of admission preclude your goal.

Now things start to get real interesting. Math is something that really can't lie, so figure this one out. The Commonwealth College alleges it can double the number of Honors students (from 1,600 to 3,200). Well, that shouldn't be so bad, right? At least more students will use the 10.8 million dollar facility that is proposed. But wait. The same document states "We would not increase overall campus enrollment but would take advantage of the Commonwealth College to raise the overall quality of the undergraduate student population on campus." Yet, standards of admission will stay the same. Something is wrong here, and you've probably already figured it out. The master plan is to phase out "average" students and replace them with look–alike alien robot "academically motivated" students. Public education? I guess not. Pack your bags, "average" student. We need the room for someone else.

But wait, there's more. It only gets more incensing with time, trust me. For the residents of Orchard Hill, there is perhaps hope: "While these residential facilities (the Hill) are in place, they will need significant upgrades in terms of quality living and learning space." Finally, an admission of guilt. Translation: Orchard Hill is substandard housing, and if we're going to house so many Honors students there, we're going to need to improve the "quality of living," to screw the "regular" students. I can only assume that all residential areas on campus would require the same adjustments, or wouldn't they just use a different area?

Now what? There are so many more aspects of the Commonwealth College proposal that are damning. This column is not an attack on the Honors Program itself, but it is simply an attack on the manifestation that is proposed for the future. Undoubtedly, the proposal needs revision and retooling. Call up the Chancellor and tell him what you think. Don't let elitism rule our tuition money. Tell him that you want a Commonwealth College that lives up to its name.

Hanson is as Hanson does

I hate Hanson. I think they are awful. I was watching David Letterman the other night and they came on and started playing their new "song." I saw three little pre– pubescent boys who look like girls and could only play one chord. They even had some over–14–year–old musicians who were standing behind them in the shadows. I bet they were the ones who were actually playing.

I had dismissed Hanson as one of those stupid fads that fire up for a while and then mercifully die down like slap bracelets and trickle–down economics, but that was before the Hanson assault changed my mind.

I spent Veteran's Day in New York City. I was having a stressful week and decided that getting away from the ghetto of UMass and going to the real thing would be good for me. Little did I know that the real thing is less of a ghetto than I thought.

Matthew Frascella

I had several missions in New York: see the Ed Sullivan theater; go to the Hello Deli; see Rupert G.; and buy a "Late Show with David Letterman" T–shirt. Hey, it's the little things in life that make me happy.

I strolled down Broadway on my quest to see Dave, avoiding feuding cab drivers and some angry people who tried to give me flyers. I was impressed with the new look of Times Square. Gone are all the "Girls, Girls, Girls" bars and in their place are our commercial darlings Disney and MTV. And on Wednesday, screaming teenie–boppers lined the street and stopped me from seeing Rupert.

When I first heard them I cracked a "Hanson must be here" joke to my friends. Little did I know how correct I was.

Picture hundreds of screaming 12– and 13–year–old girls. There were so many of them that the police were on the scene complete with their big blue barricades that they always put up when that dinosaur Dick Clark counts down the New Year and watches the ball drop.

MTV has some studio on the second floor of a building, and the teenie–boppers were lining the streets for their idols. You can't even see into the studio from the street, and I'm sure the windows are sound proof so that the cameras don't pick up the incessant honking and cursing that New York generates.

Yet they were out there hours before Hanson got there, standing, jumping and screaming like a pack of rabid animals with their "Hanson, you put the MMMMM in my BOP" and "Zach, I want to have your child" signs and their Teen magazine poster pull–outs. Are these girls even old enough to have kids? Wait a minute. I don't think Hanson is old enough to have kids.

I was not impressed. These little punks were disrupting my day, and I decided to let them know. The warmth of the Big Apple was rubbing off on me. They were letting the world know that Hanson is the greatest thing since sliced bread, and I decided that I had the right to my opinion, too. After all, I can vote for the next president; I should be able to tell them the frightening truth about their heroes.

"Hanson sucks," I shouted back.

Whap! Out of nowhere comes this slap to my chest. I was shocked. I looked over and saw the culprit, a cute little ponytailed 12–year–old girl with a look of sincere distress on her face. She had probably put all her sixth–grade might into that swing.

With a furrowed brow she began her tirade. "How can you say that about Hanson? They are the best." For her little display, she won the favor of the entire crowd. The girls were clapping and cheering like she had just saved the world or cured cancer. "You tell him," they yelled.

She had assaulted me. Technically, I think it may have been battery too. I should have grabbed one of the cops who was doing crowd control duty, but they all looked like they had their hands full containing the massive, crazed crowd. I did not want my statement to incite a riot, but the potential was there so I hastily walked away.

What did I expect from New York and New Yorkers, though? Earlier in the day I learned that they actually enjoy rooting for the Yankees and that they have drug dealers that solicit you right next to the peanut man and horse drawn carriages as you walk into Central Park.

But, the more I thought about it, the more I realized that this is a global phenomenon. I remember back to the days of the New Kids on the Block when my sister would go out and buy NKOTB everything. She had the dolls, the posters, the bedspread, the pajamas. It is insane.

If you ask me, our society limits the wrong type of music. Marilyn Manson can't be sold in Walmart, but I bet they sell Hanson. Hanson is much more volatile: it has been proven to corrupt sweet 12–year–olds and lead them to a life of violence and obnoxious public displays.

I am writing a petition to Walmart and starting a boycott. Stop selling Hanson; it destroys the very fabric of our society. It turns our youth against us. You see, sometimes censorship can be beneficial to society.

Letters to the Editor

Women's ice hockey deserves fair shake

To the editor:

Did you know that UMass has a women's ice hockey team?

Most people do not. It might just be me, but I don't think it is right for the men's team to get a half page article with two pictures for winning their first game, when all last season the women's team had a total of two captioned pictures for our 13–6–2 record.

We came in second at the Women's Ice Hockey Club team regional tournament, held at Clarkson University in Potsdam, New York and fourth at Nationals in Lake Placid. Granted, we are only a club team, but for that kind of success, I think we deserve even a small amount of recognition.

So far this season we are 2 and 0. We beat Holy Cross (who are NCAA Division II) 8–0 and UMass Lowell 4–0. You're probably wondering: if they're so good, why aren't they a varsity team? We've been asking the same question for years now and have heard answers ranging from, "There isn't enough money," to "There aren't enough locker rooms in the Mullins Center." Not enough locker rooms? I want to know what genius designed the Mullins Center with two ice surfaces but only three locker rooms! A few more cinder blocks and we would have been all set. As for not having enough money, they seem to be able to find money when they want to.

Hockey is an expensive sport. Even as a club team, we have a very high budget. Right now, the UMass Women's Ice Hockey team receives $3,000 in funding from the Student Government Association, which barely covers ice time.

We pay for our own equipment, tournament expenses, officials, and even six a.m. practices (when ice is in such high demand!). Even then, we get kicked off the ice at the whim of the men's team.

We have a fundraising game scheduled against the Amherst Police Department on November 22 at 2 p.m. Even though the ice has been donated for every other game that they've played at the Mullins Center, for our game it costs $300. Make sense? For these prices, you would think that we would at least get what we pay for, but this is not always the case.

There have been times when different events have been scheduled during the same time slot — and we are usually the ones who get the short end of the stick.

I don't mean to whine, but we are all fed up with the double standards and backward thinking that we have to compete against. I'm not pretending that we are the only UMass team in this position. Men's volleyball and crew have also been pushing for varsity status. And why shouldn't they? Women's crew and volleyball are both popular and successful teams. I'm sure their male counterparts would be equally good.

We are at UMass, home of over twenty thousand students. There must be money somewhere for twenty girls to play hockey!

If you like hockey and don't like to study on Saturday afternoons, come down to the Mullins Center and catch a game. You don't even need a ticket! Thank you to everybody who comes to our games. We appreciate your support.

Anti–gay rhetoric not wanted here

To the editor:

No, I will not say "Amen," Minister Price. I suggest next time you want to preach your perverted doctrine, do it from behind an altar where you can at least look your audience in the face when you lie to them.

Your article published In the Collegian on Friday, Nov. 6, was nothing but anti–gay rhetoric, masquerading as God's word. And I assure you, Mr. Price, the two are worlds apart. You chastise a fellow minister for saying that God hates gays. You condemn "radical" Christians who choose to "humiliate and embarrass those people who have chosen to live a lifestyle different from theirs." But I ask you, Minister Price, what have you done in your article? You group gays and lesbians with thieves, murderers, and rapists. You refer to their "wrongdoings" and "bad choices" and their need to be "rescued" by people such as yourself. You even go so far as to say that it should be "no surprise" that "God hates the gay and lesbian lifestyle."

Well, it is a surprise, Mr. Price. In fact, it's a shock. It's a shock to me that someone who preaches "Christian principles" and achieving "peace with all humanity" can, in the same article, demean and disgrace an entire population. Homosexuals are neither sinners, nor tainted souls who need to be rescued. And if this God you write of hates gay and lesbian lifestyles, that's fine. "He" and you can compare theories. Because nobody here wants to hear it.

Comic art conference set to honor Eisner

By Brian Moses and Jen Comeau
Collegian Correspondents

Tonight through Sunday something historically unparalleled will take place right here on the UMass campus. Scholars, writers, artists, and distinguished guests from all across the globe will be joining together to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of the graphic novel.

In the year 1978, Will Eisner, one of world's most influential creators within the field of comic art, developed a new concept that would forever expand the industry. He had a vision of meaningful stories — depicting human life and experience through sequential art — sitting in household libraries among the "conventional texts" of adults. This passion was fulfilled when he ventured to produce the work A Contract With God — the first ever "graphic novel." This work was unappreciated at first, often complained about and tossed upon the shelves like some hybrid outcast simply because it could not easily be categorized.

"All books vie for a place in the market, but Contract with God had no place assigned for it by mainstream booksellers," Will Eisner revealed. "The Graphic Novel logo was something I invented out of desperation."

As it would turn out, Eisner's original masterpiece would be an inspiration to the minds of writers and comic artists — much the same as his prior work had. Narrative sequential art is now among the "conventional texts" of adult libraries. The stigma of comic books and comic art being "just for kids" finally approaches abolition.

Will Eisner himself is here this weekend, serving as the guest of honor among many other renowned key–note guests. James O'Barr, creator of The Crow; Scott McCloud, author of Understanding Comics; and Howard Cruse, creator of Stuck Rubber Baby are just a few of those invited to speak at different points throughout this super symposium.

James O'Barr was born in the Detroit, Michigan area in 1960. No stranger to the adversaries of life, O'Barr was raised in various foster homes and institutions. In his early teens, he taught himself to be an artist by observing aspects of life. He studied the figure and form styles of Michelangelo, other Renaissance sculptures, photographic stills, and live models to begin with. Soon after, he learned to appreciate the works of Will Eisner and studied his masterful layouts, story structure, and pacing. O'Barr's most famous work, The Crow, was developed over many years and has since not only become the best–selling independently–published graphic novel, but also the only one to become a full length feature film.

Scott McCloud is widely praised for his book Understanding Comics, which is the product of nine years of hard work as an artist, writer, and creator. He is also well known not only for his award winning work in the comics series Zot!, but also for developing the original draft of the "Creator's Bill of Rights" — a work constructed to encourage artists and writers to be aware that they have certain rights. Scott, too, was heavily influenced by the works of Will Eisner, and attributes a great deal of success to him. He graduated with a bachelor of fine arts degree from Syracuse University — and has since produced projects of remarkable quality.

Howard Cruse is the highly respected creator of Wendel, Barefootz, and is also the founding editor of Gay Comix. He is a pioneer in the field of gay, lesbian, and underground comics, and has produced and published numerous comic strips around the United States. His most well–known work Stuck Rubber Baby is highly detailed both informationally and aesthetically, and has received much praise in the field of graphic novels. He has been drawing since childhood, commercially since the 1970s.

Will Eisner and his career within the field of comic art spans nearly 60 years — almost the entirety of the existence of comics as sequential art. He conceived and produced his first works in 1936, but it wouldn't be until his Sunday Comics feature The Spirit in 1940 that he would receive critical appraise. The seven pages he wrote and drew during this time are regarded as the classics of short form storytelling. Eisner has an amazing amount of titles, including Eye of the Storm, Comics and Sequential Art, Graphic Storytelling, and the afore mentioned A Contract with God.

This twentieth anniversary event would not have existed had it not been for the laborious efforts of its conceiver, N.C. Christopher Couch. He is a professor within the comparative literature department at the University, as well as being senior editor at Kitchen Sink Press in Northampton. Professor Couch received his Ph.D. from Columbia University where he specialized in popular culture in the United States and Mexico, Spanish Colonial and Pre–Columbian art history. He also had research interests in Colonial Mexican manuscripti and mural painting. In 1996, Professor William Moebius, head of the Comparative Literature Department, formed the Comic Art Studies Committee which combined faculty drawn from various UMass departments to develop possible educational programs and related classes. Professor Couch decided to teach classes on comic art in North America and on the international graphic novel while conceptualizing plans for the Twentieth Anniversary Conference.

Very few programs for the education of comic art as a valid medium exist in the United States. In other countries such as Japan, Mexico, and many in Europe, comic art is a highly respected medium read by both sexes, and all ages, classes, and ethnic backgrounds. The Five College area should be proud to know that it has become one of the most prominent centers in the United States for the preservation of comics and graphic novels. It includes the Words & Pictures Museum, Kitchen Sink Press, Mirage Studios, and the Xeric Foundation. This weekend is both a celebration and a reward for anyone who has dared to love sequential art.

Noble ideas can't save The Siege

COURTESY BRUCE W. TALAMON

Even the great Denzel Washington can't turn The Siege into more than just another misguided action movie.

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Staff

THE SIEGE
Directed by Edward Zwick with Denzel Washington, Annette Bening and Bruce Willis
Playing at Hampshire Mall Cinemas

Big–budget Hollywood action movies share certain characteristics: plentiful explosions, a strong narrative, and, most of all, good guys and bad guys. Historically, action movies have drawn their bad guys from a pool of people the United States was fighting, such as the Germans and the Japanese during World War II and the Russians during the Cold War. Once the Cold War ended, Hollywood was left with no major anti–American nation that they could stereotype as violent and evil, so it simply ascribed those values to all Islamic peoples from the middle east.

The problem is not only are many Islamic nations direct allies of the United States, such as Saudi Arabia, but Islam itself preaches nonviolence and peace above all. Furthermore, stereotyping Arabs as needlessly violent ignores the centuries–old religious conflicts and struggles over contested land that have shaped the fighting in the middle east. But Hollywood didn't care. It had bad guys again.

The Siege is clearly an attempt to examine and counteract the action movie stereotype of the violent Arab. The Siege eventually fails because it turns into exactly what it wants to undermine. It's just another oversimplified action movie.

Our hero is the head of the New York City FBI, played by one of our steadiest actors, Denzel Washington. Islamic terrorist cells in New York City suddenly begin attacking, blowing up a bus, then a Broadway theater, then the FBI building. Martial law is declared and the army, led by a cold–hearted general (Bruce Willis) occupies the city, rounding up Arab–Americans and herding them into internment camps. Even the son of a very Americanized Lebanese–American FBI agent is thrown into a camp, despite his father's long history of government service. From here the movie devolves from a mix of shocking violence and twisted politics into an ordinary man vs. man battle between Washington's ethical agent and Willis' power–mad general. The movie is interesting for awhile, but then it gives up.

Of course a big, booming movie like this has a lot of logical loopholes, the biggest one being the questionable government decision to send the army to invade an American city. And how on earth could the head of the FBI surprise an Army general in his heavily guarded headquarters? If you approach the movie as a simple action thriller, these plot holes are forgivable. The Siege is unceasingly tense and fast–moving, and some of the images of destruction and war have a raw power. Some of the performances are also very fine. Although Willis mails it in, Washington teeters convincingly on the line between obsession and reason and Annette Bening excels as a slightly unhinged CIA operative. But The Siege wants to do more than just entertain.

When a movie wants to be taken seriously as a balanced political statement, then it has a responsibility to present situations with a degree of complexity. Although The Siege gives us several positive Images of Arabs and Arab– Americans, all the bad guys are still Arabic. Furthermore, the images of the "good" Arabs are not presented with any depth, just a few passing images of people worshipping. From The Siege's point of view, it seems that Islamic people do not do anything other than pray and blow things up.

Director Zwick commits the same cardinal sin he committed in his earlier, more well–rounded Glory: he tells a story about a marginalized group, then locates the focus of that story in the eyes of an ethnically blank "American," Matthew Broderick in Glory, Washington here.

The Siege tries to jam a multilayered story into an action movie and it simply does not fit. All the potential for complexity collapses into good guys vs. bad guys. The good guys are the liberal–thinking Americans. The bad guys are crazy army people and any Arabic person that does not blend in. The Siege tries to counteract a stereotype and fails. At least it tries. C

Unbelievable Truth: melodic wallpaper music

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

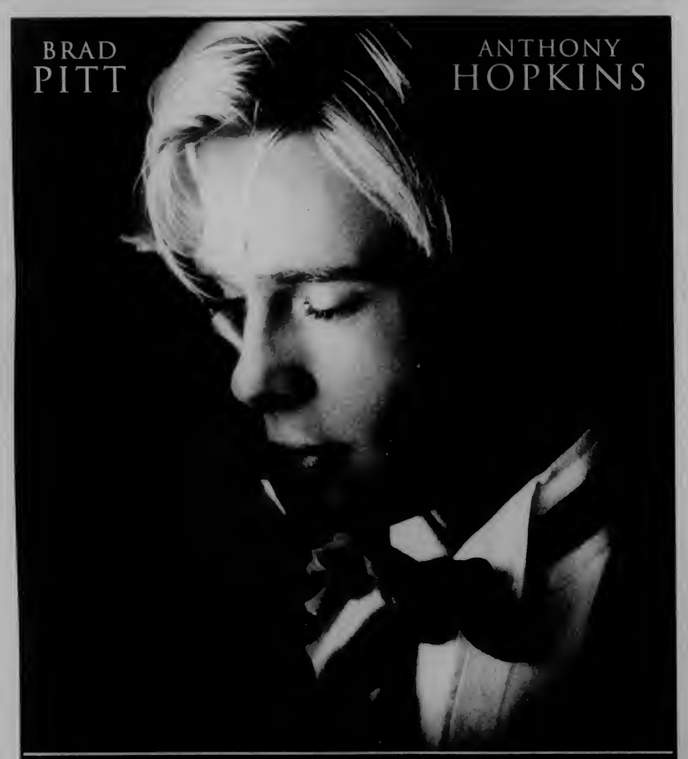
ALMOST HERE
Unbelievable Truth
Virgin

Will you like Unbelievable Truth? It is a toss up. If you are going to see Tori Amos on Sunday you will find out. This band is about as non-offensive as they come. On Almost Here, the debut release from the British trio an abundance of catchy melodies save the album from being cookie-cutter pop that will sink to the depths of alternative rock radio.

Written by bassist Jason Moulster, drummer-keyboardist Nigel Powell and guitarist/vocalist Andy Yorke, and lyrics written by Yorke (mostly while he was studying in Moscow), Almost Here doesn't break any new ground and is by no means earth-shattering, but it manages to touch a few chords with the listener with their quiet, folkish rock.

With their name taken from director Hal Hartley's first feature, The Unbelievable Truth, the band possesses a subtle and stark beauty. It is doubtful that there is not at least one song on Almost Here that can be enjoyed by anyone, but herein lies the problem. The album does not grip you in any way, and would serve just nicely as wallpaper music. Any of the 11 tracks on Almost Here could be played in a shopping mall and no one would either love it or hate it. The album does not radiate any raw energy or inventiveness but rather takes a generic tone with its soft, whispered murmur, however, please do not confuse it with mediocrity.

The songs on Almost Here are a cut above the trite soft rock they may be linked with in their genre. But trying to classify the group in such a genre poses another problem, since they just do not fit. Songs like "Solved," which opens the CD, have a gentle melodic tone, without being at all schmaltzy. Other tracks, such as "Same Mistakes," "Settle Down," and the title track, "Almost Here," follow suit — not rocking hard, but then again not ending up being a VH 1 formula. This balancing act becomes the band's strength.



Singer/lyricist Andy Yorke's words are moody and honest, but at the same time melodramatic and predictable. Unbelievable Truth are not a ground-breaking band, but they do not try to be. This album can be dismissed as fluffy, or hailed as sweeping. It could go either way. It is something to take a look at regardless. So take your seat early at the Mullins Center on Sunday and decide for yourself. B-

Soft rockers Unbelievable Truth will open up for Tori Amos at the Mullins Center.

UM trying to reach NCAAs

By Alexander Wood
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's water polo team will enter this weekend's CWPA Eastern Championships as the top-seeded team, after sweeping three games back on Oct. 31 to win the CWPA Northern Championships.

The heavily favored Minutemen, ranked 11th in the nation, will square off against George Washington in the quarterfinals in Providence tomorrow. UMass is 21–2 against eastern competition this season and will be fighting for its fifth eastern title in six years.

With the exception of a few bumps and bruises from practice, UMass will be diving into the pool healthy and refreshed after an off week.

"We've been focusing on a few things. You don't need to train as much this time of year. We've just been resting up and getting psyched to play," Massachusetts men's water polo coach Russ Yarworth said.

The last meeting between GW and the Minutemen was a 9–6 UMass victory in the ECAC title game on Nov. 6, 1997. UMass is 6–1 all time against George Washington and this weekend's clash will be the two teams' first meeting this season. And the Minutemen don't expect GW to go down without a fight.

"They're a good club that's been playing real well late in the season," Yarworth said.

With a victory over GW, UMass would move on to face the winner of the Bucknell–Brown bracket.

The Minutemen are also riding a seven–game winning streak dating back to an Oct. 18 victory over Air Force.

"We're the favorite, but it's championship time and one loss and you're done. I'm psyched and the kids know what they have to do," Yarworth said.

Senior Brian Stahl and junior goalie Richard Huntley will be looking to start right where they left off in the Northern Championships. Stahl scored five goals and Huntley tallied 25 saves that weekend.

UMass is also working with a dominating 10–2 record this season against the tournament field.

■ hockey

this is a two–game series that they will look to at least split. Though UMass stands at 1–2 in the league and 1–4 overall, it is only four points behind first place Providence.

"These Hockey East games are obviously very important for us. UMass–Lowell played Maine tight last weekend," UMass coach Joe Mallen said. "They lost one in overtime, and had a chance to beat them the next night. Everything is up for grabs in the league. You can win 5–0 one night and lose by the same score the next."

Mallen makes a very valid point, for with all the skill and talent in this league any team can really beat another on any given night. The Minutemen have been in every game they have played, including the losses to No. 10 New Hampshire and then–No. 4 Michigan State in their season opener.

Though those were very difficult losses to swallow, they hopefully have served as a lesson well learned, that lesson being that this young Minuteman team can compete with the big boys of collegiate hockey.

UMass, which has one of the youngest defensive units in the country, has managed to put together its best defensive start since joining Hockey East. The Minutemen have only allowed 16 goals in their first five games, which have been against some of the top offensive teams in the country.

"The defense has been fine. Our main priority right now is offense and special teams," Mallen said. "We basically did everything we could in practice this week to figure out a way to score more goals. We paid a lot of attention to the power play and just trying to put the puck in the net."

Unfortunately for the Minutemen, they will apply what was learned in practice this week against the top defensive team in Hockey East. The Black Bears are only allowing two goals per game in league play and 1.4 overall per outing.

Maine's goaltender, Alfie Michaud, is 1–0 in Hockey East play, and 4–0 overall, while posting a 1.98 goals against average.

UMass, on the other hand, will look to Markus Helanen, who has a 2.96 GAA between the pipes. The sophomore will get his sixth consecutive start tonight as the Minutemen will try to upset the Black Bears.

would help him tremendously down the stretch. Over 100 yards in each game might not be enough, not with Williams well ahead of the Great One. That's where the Badgers' undefeated season would work magic.

The Cinderella twins (there are two, I swear) are still home scrubbing the floors and snagging cobwebs from corners. A tough line last week for Heisman hopefuls Dante Culpepper and Joe Germaine. Culpepper tosses four picks in last week's loss to Auburn, and Germaine, well, he just lost, which was enough of a surprise to knock the little tike off track. He was simply outplayed by Michigan State's Brad Burke.

1) Williams, 2) Couch, 3) UCLA's Cade McNown, 4) Dayne, 5) tie, Bishop and Oregon's Akili Smith.

Mauser's Toilet Bowl Picks of the Week:

Last week: 2–1
Season: 12–12

Michigan State's win at Columbus? I'm not impressed.

Not only was Ohio State the clearcut favorite to win the national championship, but Michigan State was suffering from a down year, fluttering around the .500 mark.

Now they return home to East Lansing, where the accommodations are much more comfortable.

Purdue's Drew Brees happens to be The Man, though. Brees has surpassed 500 yards passing twice this season, and might need a third.

Last week, the Spartans held Germaine under 300 yards for the first time in a month. Brees will not fall victim to that problem. Expect a big day from the sophomore.

I'll take Purdue, giving 2 1/2, at Michigan State.

Men's cross country wants a good outing

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

There comes a time in the season where the adrenaline starts flowing a little faster and every little detail is treated as a matter of great importance.

Post–season play can be a harrowing experience for even the most experienced of athletes. Massachusetts men's cross country coach Ken O'Brien has been there, and knows his squad will have to push itself to the limit this Saturday as it returns to Van Cortlandt Park in the Bronx, N.Y., to participate in the NCAA Regional Qualifiers.

O'Brien realizes this will be survival of the fittest, where a spot just out of the top three basically guarantees an end to the season.

"There are 30 schools here pushing for the top two spots, which will automatically qualify you for the NCAA Championships," he said. "Placing third or fourth may get you an at–large selection, of which there will be 13 all together, but the top two are the only locks. This will be the case in all nine regions."

But as far as UMass is concerned, there is only one race taking place this weekend, and that is in New York. The Minutemen are focusing on the meet at hand, and are aware of who will pose the biggest threat.

"Providence is the favorite coming in, as they are ranked No. 8 in the country," O'Brien said. "We can't ignore No. 11 Iona and No. 22 Dartmouth either. These are the main schools to watch for."

Like any good coach, O'Brien is staying realistic about the chance UMass has. He's not promising them the world, nor is he preaching disaster. With a team as deep as his, he expects to see a solid overall effort.

"Taking last year into consideration, right now we are looking at a 11th or 12th place finish. With good preparation, it's entirely possible that we can finish anywhere in the 10–15 positions," he said.

The biggest question mark this weekend lies in a spot that the Minutemen can do nothing about: their youth. All season the younger members of the squad have performed above expectations, and must come up huge at Van Cortlandt to propel UMass to the next level. O'Brien says this factor could act in any direction.

"The younger guys on this team were used to running the three–mile course in high school, and now at the college level it's five. But this weekend, it's been bumped to 6.2 miles, something the younger guys haven't seen," he said. "The veterans can handle this, but for the younger guys it is a concern. All we can do is let them know what to expect and hope they continue to perform at a high level."

Minutewoman x-c off to NCAA regionals

By Sean Lavoine
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's cross country team will compete in the NCAA Regional Qualifiers tomorrow in New York City. The race will be held at the prestigious Van Cortlandt Park.

Two team bids will be up for grabs, as Division I teams throughout New England and New York will be trying to earn a trip to the NCAA Championships to be held Nov. 23 at the University of Kansas in Lawrence, Kans.

While UMass is fresh off its fourth consecutive Atlantic 10 victory, qualifying for the NCAAs will take a tremendous team effort.

"We probably will need a terrific team performance, even better than that of the A–10 championship performance," Massachusetts women's cross country coach Julie LaFreniere said.

A great effort will be needed because the race will feature cross country powerhouses Providence, Dartmouth, Boston College and Brown. Nationally ranked Providence is the favorite to be one of the teams that will advance to Lawrence.

"I don't see anybody beating Providence. They are such a deep team, and they have been running well all season long," LaFreniere said.

With the talent that will be present Saturday, LaFreniere would be pleased if her team finished in the top 10.

"I think a top 10 finish would be respectable. If we run as well as we did two weeks ago, we might be able to squeak into the top five," LaFreniere said.

Along with the top two teams, there will likely be an at– large bid given by the NCAA to the third place team due to the competitiveness of distance running in the Northeast. The top five individuals, who are not on a qualifying team will also be invited to the NCAA finals later this month.

While it is not likely for UMass to qualify, LaFreniere is hoping for her team to beat other teams they have raced against this year.

"I would like for us to beat Vermont and Boston University. We split with Vermont this year, and have been very competitive with Boston University," LaFreniere said.

Senior captain Nicole Way feels the same way.

"There are certain teams we are looking to beat. Vermont and Boston University are certainly right at the top of our list," she said.

At the New England Championships held Oct. 19, UMass finished sixth behind BU and Vermont, while during its only home race of the year, UMass finished ahead of the Catamounts.

As far as confidence is concerned, the Minutewomen are certainly not lacking. After beginning the season 1–3, they have rallied to win 13 of their last 17 games. One of the four losses during the stretch was dealt to them by then No. 2 ranked Connecticut, who also topped Penn State this year. The Huskies, however, needed two overtime periods to finally edge the inspired UMass squad on October 24.

"We're going to win every game we go into. That is my feeling, and that's the way I prepare for every game," said Shea, who constantly reminds her squad that it is capable of beating any opponent. "That's the way my team's starting to think now, and they've done a great job. I think the key is [the fact] that they've found the confidence in themselves and in each other."

The members of this UMass squad are no strangers to the big dance, having qualified for the field for three consecutive seasons. Despite the level of consistency which the program has maintained, Shea feels that a trip to the tournament is no longer enough. After enduring three straight first–round losses, the team has been challenged by her to reach higher ground.

"It's just not good enough to be there anymore," said Shea, who hopes her team will produce a different result in a rematch of its first 1997 tournament game. "This entire group was here last year, and they know that they can compete with anybody within this tournament. It's just not good enough for them to be there anymore."

Despite the tough opponents looming ahead for her team, Shea refuses to worry about whom or where her Minutewomen are playing. Instead, she is focusing on the abilities of her team, which allowed it to play in a minuscule 12–team tournament field. Although Penn State may be underestimating her team, Shea, as a two–time competitor in the Final Four while playing for UMass, realizes that there is more to field hockey than just probability and statistics.

"They know that they're one of the best teams in the country, irregardless of what records say, or what people say, or anything else," she said. "They know what they have in their hearts, and where they want to go. There's really no stopping them. When anybody believes that in themselves, it's very difficult to stop them."

"This season is not a disappointment. There were too many improvements to call it a disappointment, but we have an unsatisfied feeling as a team," Holtsberg said. "It leaves us with a desire to want more."

It's true that the transition for Holtsberg might have been a little easier because of the traveling that she did with her juniors team, and because she brought a little more experience to the table. Nevertheless, she is still a freshman and counts on her teammates and coach for guidance through her first collegiate season.

"Both Kari [Hogancamp] and Jill [Meyers] have been great. Jill was at my house in Illinois for a tournament, and I look up to her determination and the way she plays the game. Kari is such a steady player on the court and also a great influence off the court as well," Holtsberg said.

"The whole team has been great, not just the juniors. Coach Kenny has also been really great. She's hard on me but I have a lot of respect for her. She knows more about the game than any other coach I've known. She also keeps the lines of communication open for all us freshman, which is really good for us."

Kenny also commented on Holtsberg's performance this year and where she could be in the future.

"Because of her experience I expect a lot, but she is only a freshman and she's only going to get better," she said. "She does a lot of really big things well, but there's a lot of little things she needs to work on.

"Heather is good setter already and she has the tools to be a great setter. Her only drawback is her size, but there have been numerous setters her size that were great. If she makes better decisions, by the time she is a senior she'll be great."

Despite the improvements this season for the UMass volleyball, there is still a long way to go. For Holtsberg there is only one way, and that's up. The goal has been set now for next year's campaign, the Atlantic 10 tournament for the Minutewomen, and if that goal is to become a reality, Holtsberg will be a key component to UMass' success.

"No one is leaving this team, and we will get to train hard all spring," Holtsberg said. "We are definitely on our way to A–10s next year, because we are extremely determined to get there."

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Your use of language and behavior to affect those around you must be planned with great care. Now is no time to improvise.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — A great deal is on the line today, but you may feel as though someone has left you in the dark. You must try to gather more information.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Casual discussion with others born under your sign are sure to lead to major decisions, though you may doubt your own powers at first. Be confident.

KSU, 'Huskers, to battle; Plus a Heisman watch

The guards are changing.

Oh wait...it's a changing of the guard in the Big 12 conference.

When the 1998 schedule was cemented for Kansas State, this Saturday looked like the day where all cylinders would have to be going full speed. Instead, the Wildcats are 10 point favorites, scratching their heads, wondering what the heck's gone in Lincoln since the summer.

After all the skepticism about the Wildcats, the opportunity to vault themselves into national stardom is submerged a bit by the Nebraska Cornhuskers fall from perfection.

Let's put the year 1998 into perspective. UN has two losses, and are in serious danger of picking up their third. From 1993-1997, the 'Huskers had three losses total.

Curse of Osborne, perhaps.

Coach Frank Solich has the weight of a football nation on his shoulders. One loss for every surfer in the state still calls for too many wetsuits. Hint: Nebraska doesn't have an ocean to cut up.

Texas A&M found the solution, as did Texas two weeks ago. And KSU coach Bill Snyder surely has watched the tapes. The big play kills Nebraska. Snyder will have quarterback Michael Bishop's arm at full strength for the showdown.

After UN quarterback Eric Crouch coughed up the ball at the Texas 12, the 'Horns Major Applewhite hit Bryan White for 76 yards, which set up the game-tying field goal...a possible 10 point swing. A Randy McCown 81- yard touchdown pass gave the Aggies their first score, helping defeat Nebraska 28-21.

State has their big play guy in Bishop, who could use a big game to help his dim chances at the Heisman Trophy. Night could be falling on the Manhattan program, though, as only left tackle Ryan Cummings and center Randall Cummins will return for 1999, as nine starters on offense graduate.

Colorado held Bishop to 9-for-25 passing, yet still lost 16- 9, at home, easily the smallest margin of victory on the year for the 'Cats. Runner-up in that category is KSU's 52-20 thrashing of Oklahoma State. Ouch.

Although Bishop has thrown only one interception, he has not been in the thick of a barnburner yet this season.

Do or die, now or never, whatever you want to call it, if the Wildcats want any respect, a rout would be clutch. Texas' emergence into the Top 25 certainly helps KSU's cause, but their eight-pack of cupcakes otherwise haven't tempted anyone into believing they are for real.

Nebraska plays without back DeAngelo Evans and quarterback Bobby Newcombe, who rank 1-2 in 'Husker rushing offense. That leaves I-back Dan Alexander and fullback Joel Makovicka to carry the load, and it load they most certainly must carry. The tag team weighs in at about 500 pounds total. The duo runs well between the tackles, but their lateral movement will be put to the test by the experienced Wildcat front seven. Alexander ran for 110 yards and three touchdowns in defeating Iowa State, but bet on KSU countering that attack clogging the middle to stop the run to make Crouch throw the ball more than he wants to.

The 'Huskers average 270 yards a game on the ground. KSU gives up 72, and has only allowed one rushing touchdown on the year, a push-in by Northern Illinois in a 73-7 victory. They held Texas' Ricky Williams to 43 yards on 25 carries. He averages over 200. Good defense.

I don't know about you, Nebraska. It's time to show everyone why you're the team of the 90's. KSU is thinking Fiesta Bowl, with Ohio State's loss to Michigan State. An unimpressive Tennessee win and a KSU win? Hmmmm...

Giving 10 1/2, I'll take the 'Cats. Kansas State 41, Nebraska 20.

Heisman Watch:

Williams is a perfect role model for the NCAA's hopeless pursuit of more senior class superstars. Williams put the NFL on hold and now is posing in the end zone. Hey, he's still running. trophy in hand.

Kentucky quarterback Tim Couch is the closest contender, having thrown for over 300 yards in each game this season. The Wildcats' record, though, jumps out. Little more than a mediocre team, Couch's effect on Heisman voters might have less of an impact.

Ron Dayne of Wisconsin needs tomorrow's Michigan game more than anyone. An undefeated season, for sure, would be more in the interests of Dayne, but a strong individual performance against a tough rush defense

Minutemen set to square off with Maine

UMass looking to avenge last year's blowout in Orono

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Maine quarterback Mickey Fein sure wishes the preparation for this weekend's bash with the No. 10 Massachusetts football team was much like last year's version.

The idea was to sit in the pocket and throw. And it worked. Sort of. Maine won 49-6.

The tables have turned a bit since last year's thunderous crash. A new coach and a new system have guided the Minutemen into a whole new world. Sentences formed during post-game press conferences include "post-season" and "national championship."

After last year's 2-9 mark, who'd have thought it?

The history of the matchup has been consistent, but not in a way that coach Mark Whipple would hope to continue. Maine has won three straight and five of the last six games against the Minutemen.

"If you're going to be a champion, you play it one game at a time," said recently named Eddie Robinson Award finalist and UMass coach Mark Whipple. "Our guys know what kind of team Maine is."

Football
Maine @ Massachusetts
Saturday, 12:30 p.m.

Before last week, scouting Maine could have been easy. Stop Fein, stop the Black Bears.

But in beating Delaware in Newark last weekend, 39-27, a new interesting aspect has been introduced to coach Jack Cosgrove's squad. Roylston English, barely a depth chart special in the pre-season, ran for 180 yards in the win.

Already in the top 10, a win would seemingly solidify the Minutemen a spot in the Division I-AA playoffs. Still at stake, though, is a possible home date over Thanksgiving break, rather than traveling. Whipple, however, wants to keep the focus on the Black Bears.

"That's just talk. If we don't find a way to beat Maine, then that stuff is out the window," he said.

UMass quarterback Todd Bankhead, coming off his worst performance of the year, welcomes the Minutemen's return to Amherst. In three home games, the junior has tossed eight touchdowns against only two interceptions. In the last three games away from home, Bankhead threw for nine interceptions and four touchdowns.

Now is not the right time to be turning the ball over, as Maine leads the conference in turnover margin, coming in with a plus-4 advantage over its opponents. Last year, they took the award handily, completing the year up 12 on their opponents.

Maine also brings the conference's best pass defense to the table. Delaware did not find that overbearing, as Matt Nagy threw for 558 yards. The Blue Hens, though, fell behind by 20 points in the first quarter and couldn't crawl back into the game.

UMass running back Marcel Shipp needs 210 yards to become the all-time single-season leader in rushing yards for the Minutemen. After last week's 144 yard game against Rhode Island, the conference's best run defense, Shipp looks to capitalize on one of the A-10's most porous front seven. The Black Bears hand out 195 yards rushing on average.

The Minutemen finish up the season in a revenge bid against UConn in Amherst next Saturday afternoon at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium. The Huskies rallied from a two-touchdown deficit to beat UMass in overtime 44-41 last month in Storrs.

Women's hoop to open up with St. John's

After dropping its lone exhibition game last week, the Massachusetts women's basketball team will put on the Maroon and White and lace up its shoes for its first meaningful action of the season tomorrow against St John's.

The 12 p.m. season-opener at the William D. Mullins Center will kick off what will prove to be a grueling schedule for the 1997-98 Atlantic 10 runners-up.

"We want to start off with a big win," Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien said. "We will be facing so many tough opponents throughout the season. It is very important we establish a home-court advantage early on."

The Minutewomen fell to the Russian Select squad 79-55 last Saturday, but O'Brien feels the team has put that experience behind it.

"The team came out a little flat last week," O'Brien said. "However it was only a tune-up, and the players have practiced hard all week for the their first true test."

St. John's will be the first rung in the ladder for UMass to climb, and although they are coming off a rough season, they have a tough core of veteran players.

The Lady Red Storm finished at 6-21 overall last season, 4-14 in the Big East. This included a matchup with the Minutewomen that UMass won 60-54 at Alumni Hall.

"We were able to defeat St. John's last season, but they gave us a good battle," O'Brien said. "They have their top players returning that we will need to look out for."

Last season, Ebony Dickinson, a 5-foot-10 guard led St. John's, posting a 13.1 points per game average, while grabbing six rebounds per game. Croatian forward Andrijana Bedalov also chipped in about nine a contest to go along with nearly six boards.

"They are a big team that we will need to play physical with," O'Brien said. "They will use a lot of match-up zones much like the Select team used last week."

The Minutewomen will also look to their veterans for the bulk of their production early on. Senior Tez Kraft and junior Iaswana Bradley will be two of the Minutewomen called upon to generate offense throughout the season.

Bradley was one of the bright spots last week, as she notched 15 points in her first game back after missing the entire 1997-98 campaign.

Interior defense will be another key element as UMass will look to match up with the Lady Red Storm inch for inch.

"We need all of our bigger players to help out down low," O'Brien said. "Yolanda Rayside and Caroline Nehls will be looked upon to provide us with a lot of rebounds and solid defense."

The initial games of this season will also allow O'Brien to settle on a regular rotation of players that she will utilize throughout the season.

"Nothing is set as of right now," O'Brien said. "The people that compete the hardest and contribute the most early on will see a lot of playing time."

Certainly, O'Brien will be looking closely at the point guard situation, where she will look to make up for the loss of Sabriya Mitchell. Kathy Coyner appears to have won the starting job as the floor general, with Tonya Thomas backing her up.

"The bottom line right now is we need to step up and play our game," O'Brien said. "We can't be too worried about who the opponent is, because we need to be concerned with ourselves first to start off right."

Minutewomen Notes: Tez Kraft was named to the A-10 preseason first team, while Kelly Van Huisen was a second team selection...The trip through the Big East will continue for the Minutewomen on Monday night when they will travel to Chestnut Hill to face Boston College.

Tez Kraft and the Massachusetts women's basketball team will open up the 1998-99 season tomorrow at noon against St. John's.

Setting UMass on the right path

Rookie Holtsberg playing like a veteran

By Poul Teves
Collegian Staff

There was once a seventh grader from Wheaton, Ill. who dreamed of attaining a scholarship to a Division I college and playing volleyball, with the ultimate goal of winning the national championship.

This seventh grader was Heather Holtsberg, and all but one of her dreams has come true.

Holtsberg decided on UMass as the place to fulfill her dream. Although the hook hasn't been closed on this current season, this freshman and her teammates will need to win their final two games and receive a lot of help in order to take the next step.

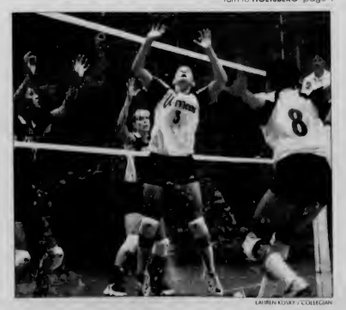
That next step would be the Atlantic 10 tournament, but Holtsberg's mentality and determination has not allowed her or the rest of the Massachusetts women's volleyball spikers to give up on their goal.

Holtsberg brings a lot of experience to UMass. She has been playing volleyball since she was 12. First, playing in a program which was run in her town, then for Wheaton South High School, where she was a two-time letter-winner. The setter then played her senior year at Downers Grove High School. She also played for Sport Performance Club, a juniors team.

"I expect a lot from Heather, more than I do from other freshman because of her club experience, but she has made our team better," UMass volleyball coach Bonnie Kenny said.

As the setter, Holtsberg is expected to run the offense, as well as set the pace of the offense. Holtsberg has been able to do that thus far this season, but like any freshman she has made little mistakes.

"I expect Heather to run a fast-tempo offense, and she has gotten better. She has also improved our offense. Our kills are up and our hitting percentage is up. She is doing what we need her to do, and she is doing a good job," Kenny said.



Holtsberg is a determined and intense player, who has high expectations for herself, as it pertains to the team and her own development.

"When I first got here for preseason, I learned just as much training as Jenny [Drennan]'s understudy," Holtsberg said. "Setter is a tough position. In high school, when I was a sophomore, I was known as a defensive specialist, but I would go to setter's practice and training so I could get on the court."

Holtsberg has exceeded the expectations as a freshman setter. She has tallied in her inaugural season 930 assists, 173 digs, 25 blocks and 14 service aces.

However, for this freshman individual stats aren't enough. The team goal of reaching the A-10 tournament has not been met yet, and if it's not, Thanksgiving turkey will be a little harder to swallow.

UM off to NCAAs; will play Penn State

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

It sounds as though Penn State field hockey coach Char Morrett isn't too worried about her team's contest against UMass tomorrow at noon, when the two teams will meet in Princeton, N.J. in the opening round of the NCAA Tournament.

In fact, she may have even assumed that her Lady Lions [17-4, Big Ten Champs] will roll past the Minutewomen [14-7, Atlantic 10 Champs].

"I'm excited that we're playing in an area that will be close for our fans," Morrett said in a press release statement sent by the Penn State Media Relations office to the Daily Collegian, "...and the other thing is I'm excited to play two teams we haven't seen this season. That eliminates any false expectations."

On the surface her statement may seem complimentary; however, the quote suggests that Morrett plans on playing two games at Princeton — a rather bold assumption for a team which must contend [in a single elimination tournament] with a red hot UMass squad.

The winner of the contest is slated to meet Princeton on Sunday. The Tigers [15-2] received a first-round bye, and host the first two games of their bracket. The team which leaves New Jersey without a loss will advance to the Final Four.

The Minutewomen, on the other hand, appear to be taking the "our next game could be our last game" approach. According to head coach Patty Shea, "It's now a one-game season."

Although Penn State edged her squad 5-3 in an exciting first-round game of last season's national tournament, Shea feels that her team is playing as well as it ever has, and that it is more than capable of upsetting the seemingly complacent Lady Lions.

"The positives from last year's game is that our players know that they can compete," she said. "They know that they were in that game, and a number of times, they were ahead in that game. With some of the things that we've cleaned up [for] this year, it's a totally different

Mallen hopes to take UMass to the pinnacle of Hockey East

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Entering his fifth season as Massachusetts hockey coach, Joe Mallen expects great things from his young team. Mallen carries a 54-105-11 record entering this year, but this is a mark he is almost certain to improve on in 1998-99.

The task is a difficult one. His job is to bring the UMass hockey program back to a competitive Division I level. Mallen has proven before that he's a winner. In his first season as UMass coach, Mallen and the Minutemen posted a record of 20-9.

"We're really excited about getting going again and to get the program moving in the right direction," Mallen said. "I'm excited to get working with a new group of student athletes. Twenty of our 28 guys are living in the dorms and that says a lot about our youth."

Mallen, a 1977 graduate of Michigan State, also posted a 80-46-2 record at in his days at the helm of UMass-Boston. Mallen lead the Beacons from a club team to a Division II powerhouse. He did so by directing the Beacons to the ECAC Division III Championship, before becoming a Division II team in 1982.

There is a lot of evidence that Mallen is taking the right steps to bringing UMass hockey back to prosperity. He started by hiring two new assistant coaches, Bill Gilligan and Dale Dunbar.

Gilligan brings international experience to the team. He was a coach and general manager in Europe for 19 years. He also played professional hockey and for the United States Olympic team.

As time goes on things change. The set up before was that we had one assistant coach constantly on the road and another assistant here helping out, and we were looking to rework that this year," Mallen said.

Joe Mallen

Dunbar will specifically help the team on defense. Dunbar brings National Hockey League experience to the Minutemen. Having played with both the Boston Bruins and the Vancouver Canucks. He also has a lot of coaching experience under his belt.

The situation with this team now is that we only have Bryan Fitzgerald who can't return next year. With that in mind, I wanted to go out and get two assistant coaches that could do a lot of coaching. The two assistants right now have had a lot of experience coaching and playing hockey, which the players can really relate to," Mallen said.

"Both Bill and Dale have played at both the pro and collegiate levels, which gives them an instant credibility among the players, beyond their wide range of knowledge of hockey," he said.

Mallen also has done a good job recruiting players. This year, the Minutemen brought in 10 freshman to play here at the William D. Mullins Center. These recruits include forwards Martin Miljko, Darcy King and Jedd Crumb all of whom played junior hockey in Canada last year and scored 105 points or more.

"I think we've had a great recruiting class. I feel that our progress as a program will first be shown in our recruiting," Mallen said.

The recruiting class also included top defenseman Toni Soderholm who scored 59 points last season in Finland, Randy Drohan who tallied 48 points — including 17 goals — in the Ontario Juniors and Chris Brannen who scored 26 points last season en route to taking top defenseman honors in Ontario Juniors.

"When I think of our freshman class, I think in terms from blue line back. Not to take anything away from our freshman forwards, but we have a solid group of young defensemen," Mallen said. "All four of those guys are showing great promise."

This freshman class is a direct result of Mallen and the UMass assistant coaches striving to improve the Massachusetts hockey program.

Mallen has also taken great strides, along with UMass Athletic Director Bob Marcum, in improving the schedule, especially by adding teams like Michigan State and Colorado College to their already loaded conference schedule. That schedule already consists of nationally ranked competition including Boston College, Maine, New Hampshire and Boston University.

"This is the toughest schedule we've had thus far. Bob Marcum and I have worked hard to develop a competitive schedule. We could play teams in the MAAC conference, but that wouldn't help us advance the program," Mallen said.

Another one of Mallen's major foci has been on academics. Last season, Mallen had four players make the Hockey East All-Academic team, while at the same time working to make UMass a national powerhouse again.

The UMass bench general will also get his second year with players who are beginning to come into their own as hockey players. UMass' sophomore class sports a bright future with players such as R.J. Gates, Kris Wallis, Jeff Turner, Kevin Tucker and Nick Stephens. These players will get to evolve in the second year under Mallen, as well as new coaches Dunbar and Gilligan.

"The strength of our team lies in our sophomore class. It starts with Markus Helanen, Wallis, Turner, Stephens and Tucker. This is a group we can really build on," Mallen said.

The another key component to Mallen's success this season will also be the performance of the aforementioned Helanen, who carries with him a 3.50 goals against average thus far this season, and has already saved over 70 shots in two games.

"One thing about Markus last year was that he played games against the top teams in two conferences. He played Princeton, and lost in overtime, in a game that could have ended differently had we not gotten a goal called back. He also played a great game against Boston College and played really well," Mallen said.

"Markus has worked really hard over the summer and in the preseason and he's a goalie that can steal games for us by himself...and has the making of a great collegiate goalie."

The last major component of the team Mallen needs to work with this season is the offense, which sputtered at times last season.

This season UMass returns key goalscorers Jeff Blanchard and Nathan Sell, as well as returning defensive power play leader and captain Dean Stork.

"We need scoring across the board from a lot of guys. We got that in our preseason game," Mallen said. "Jeff Blanchard and Nathan Sell as upperclassmen need to put the puck in the net. We need guys to break out of their shells. Instead of being single-goal scorers they need to be multiple-goal scorers."

Mallen concluded by saying, "We're not looking at next year or the next three years. We got to do some damage right now in this league and return UMass to a winning program."

UMass looking to gain respect
Minutemen want to get out of cellar

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

Respect. It's a simple word with a very complex meaning.

In the game of hockey, especially, it takes on a definition of a huge magnitude. Sure, all teams will tell you that they respect their opponents and that they don't take anything for granted, but it's also that same trait that can turn into an intimidating factor at times.

Since the reinstatement of the Massachusetts hockey program back in 1993-94, respect is something that the Minutemen have been striving to gain. At times they have found it, like in upsets over nationally ranked Maine and New Hampshire squads, but more often than not, UMass has been disregarded as a lower tier team in the conference.

So when the Hockey East preseason poll was announced, the Minutemen were picked to finish dead last in the conference. Although the ranking was disheartening, the Minutemen did only win six games last season and lost 10 seniors off that team.

"Last year, for instance, we were touted highly in Hockey East, and we didn't live up to it. I think it's [the predicted last place finish] better because I think that we're going to surprise a lot of people."
– Senior alternate captain Bryan Fitzgerald

"We haven't earned respect [from the rest of the conference] because we haven't proven ourselves yet," UMass captain Dean Stork said. "We only won six games last year and we're a young team this year."

That ranking, though, may prove to be a blessing in disguise for the Minutemen. UMass was picked to finish in the middle of the pack in 1997-98, set stumbled to a six win season. This time around, the last place prediction places the Minutemen in a positive situation in the respect that there's no place to go but up.

"Last year, for instance we were touted highly in Hockey East, and we didn't live up to it," senior alternate captain Bryan Fitzgerald said. "I think it's [the predicted last place finish] better because I think that we're going to surprise a lot of people."

No matter what the coaches in the conference say, one thing is for sure with this UMass team: the Minutemen have high expectations for the upcoming season.

Offense

Junior alternate captain Jeff Blanchard returns up front for the Minutemen and will anchor the UMass offense. The speedy winger is the top returning scorer for the maroon and white, as he scored 19 points last season.

The Minutemen have the benefit of a talented sophomore class which should pose plenty of problems for opponents. Kris Wallis, R.J. Gates, Jeff Turner and Nick Stephens are all solid two-way players who can light the lamp with regularity.

"The strength of our team lies in our sophomore class," UMass coach Joe Mallen said.

UMass will rely on a balanced offensive attack this season, meaning that it will need production from more than just a handful of players to win games. Others who will be looked upon to chip in are junior Nathan Sell, Fitzgerald, Ray Greever, Bryan Kennedy and a freshman class that is headed by Darcy King and Jedd Crumb among others.

"We're going to need scoring across the board to be successful," Mallen said.

Defense

UMass will rely upon its captain Stork, to take command of a young defensive unit for the Minutemen. Sophomores Kevin Tucker and Joey Culgin appear ready to make an impact and take a leadership role on the blue line. That will be key with the addition of freshmen Tom Soderholm, Chris Brannen, Randy Drohan and Justin Shaw to the UMass back-

"We like his size, his stance, and his puck control. I think we made a great decision [in bringing him to UMass], and my only question is how good will this kid get over the next three years, not just the next three periods."

lins.

"We have three returning defensemen, and we got each of the younger guys paired with an older guy," Mallen said. "I think that will give them support and help those guys to take the young guys under their wing."

Soderholm is a legitimate playmaker from the point and will log plenty of ice time on the power play unit along with Stork. Brannen, Drohan and Shaw are also solid two way blueliners, and Brannen has already earned Hockey East Rookie of the Week honors this season.

Goaltending

One of the key components to the success of the 1998-99 UMass hockey team will be sophomore netminder Markus Helanen. The Vantaa, Finland native has been stellar in the early going for the Minutemen and appears ready to make his mark as one of the top goalies in the conference.

"We like his size, his stance, and his puck control," said Mallen of Helanen. "I think we made a great decision [in bringing him to UMass], and my only question is how good will this kid get over the next three years, not just the next three periods."

Also battling for ice time for the Minutemen will be freshman Mike Johnson. The product of Excelsior, Minn. was a standout in high school in both baseball and hockey and should see some minutes for UMass. Sophomore Jack McDonough, the team's third netminder, will also look to find some time between the pipes this season.

Sophomore forward Kris Wallis will be one of the top offensive threats for the Massachusetts hockey team.

Young defensive unit looks to pay dividends for UMass

By James Murphy
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen feels that despite the young age defense on the team, their skill is what encourages.

Mallen's explanation, taken from a pre season interview, describes exactly what UMass hockey fanatics can expect from the Minutemen blueliners this season, their fourth season as a Division I member of the Hockey East conference.

The Minutemen return only four defensemen from last season, a campaign in which UMass allowed 142 goals.

Due to the lack of experience in the defensive corps this season UMass fans might have a tendancy to worry, but don't press the panic button just yet. As Mallen stated, the skill level of this new crew is encouraging.

The leader of this young defense will be junior Dean Stork, who also is the team captain. The Penticton, British Columbia native will bring a much needed sense of toughness to this year's edition of the Mullins D-MEN. Also returning to the defense this season will be senior Brendan Shaw and sophmores Kevin Tucker and Joey Culgin.

In addition to the returnees, there will also be five freshmen in that unit. These newcomers are Chris Brannen, Randy Drohan, Luke Duplessis, Justin Shaw and Toni Soderholm.

The veterans

The captain, Stork, will be looked upon to bring a great deal of leadership and experience along with his physical game to his young defensive mates this season. The 23 year-old blueliner has improved all the areas of his game in his tenure here at UMass. He has become a terrific special teams player, which will help the Minutemen, as they scored only 22 power-play goals on 154 attempts.

After playing solidly with a cast on his arm for most of last season, sophomore defenseman Kevin Tucker should be even better this season at full strength.

In addition, when asked what he feels can ease the adjustment process of the five freshman defenseman, the captain had plenty to say.

"Hopefully we can keep up the pace and go out and play hard everyday," he said. "In terms of the freshman we just have to keep talking to them everyday and keep things positive and simple. They're a great freshmen class, one of the best. It's going to take a couple of games for new guys to get used to the speed of the games, but once they've got a few under their belt, they will do just fine."

Stork said that "positive reinforcement" will be a key to the freshman's confidence level.

"We [the upperclassmen] must be sure to always point out when they make a good play and tell them to keep their heads up when they make mistakes."

The lone senior behind the blue-line, is Brendan Shaw. Shaw did not see too much ice time last season, playing in only two games, but with such a young crew, is hoping to factor into the lineup more often this season.

Another returning defensmen, who played in all 33 games last season, half of which he had a cast on his left arm, is Tucker. Despite that handicap, Tucker was able to grab the team's most improved player award last season, and looks to be even better at full strength this year.

Tucker who stands 6 foot-5 and weighs 225 pounds, should be another intimidating force on defense. He is a good penalty killer and has been known to hit opposing players like a MACK truck. When asked what he hopes to bring to the lineup Tucker immediately replied:

"Hard, physical play! Toughness! I want to be a presence on the ice.

Well with his size, that shouldn't be a problem. Tucker also pointed out that though he intends to play a hard-nosed physical game, he will not forget to play a disciplined game.

"Last season, we had too many penalties, so discipline will definitely be a key factor this season," he said.

Finishing off the list of returnees to the UMass defense, will be sophomore Joey Culgin. Culgin came to the Minutemen midway through last season, after spending the first half with the Omaha Lancers of the U.S.H.L. He impressed many with his ability to step right into the lineup.

Culgin is expected to be a regular on the power-play, as he is known for his ability to carry the puck into the offensive zone.

"He has a strong transition game," said Mallen, "He plays a very physical game and will help in the corners."

The newcomers

Of the five freshman defensemen on this season's squad, two are potential 1999 NHL draft picks [Brannen and Justin Shaw], and all five are six feet or taller.

"The talent and size are there," Mallen said. "It's just a matter of time and development."

Hopefully for UMass, this new crew can develop under game situations as they will be thrown right into the thick of things, playing in probably the toughest, most talented conference in the country.

A midseason addition during the 1997-98 campaign, Framingham native Joey Culgin will be one of the blueline mainstays for UMass in 1998-99.

Chris Brannen, a 6-2, 195 pound defensemen, leads the freshman class in terms of potential as he is likely candidate for the Canadian World junior team and a potential in the 1999 N.H.L. Entry draft pick. Brannen is expected to have an immediate impact this season.

Also expected to make his presence felt quickly is Toni Soderholm, a 6-2, 185 pounder from Helsinki, Finland who played junior hockey in both Finland and Canada.

Next on the list of newcomers is Justin Shaw, who should wreak havoc on opposing forwards. Shaw is one of the top rated defensmen in the country within his age group.

Rounding out the freshman defensive quintet are Luke Duplessis, from Framingham, Mass. and Randy Drohan from Mississauga, Ontario. Both are expected to add toughness and possess a hard shot from the point.

"We're also very solid in goal with Mike Johnson. It's just going to be know how much he will play, but he has looked great thus far," Mallen said.

Mallen knew that he would have a large freshman group coming in this season, along with 10 returning sophomores, when he began looking for new assistants. He knew that the emphasis would be on coaching and developing these young talents over the next several years.

"I knew that only [Bryan] Fitzgerald would graduate [next year] next year, so with that in mind that's how I went about selecting assistant coaches. I wanted coaches that could do more coaching," Mallen said. "We all know how important recruiting is, but the two assistant coaches both have head coaching experience, and have played a lot internationally and professionally. That gives them instant credibility among the players."

How good will this freshman class be, and what kind of impact will they make on the UMass program, now and in the future?

Mallen pointed out the defense for two reasons. One, he recruited some serious talent on defense. Two, he knows that defense was a big weakness for the Minutemen last year, and that these young players will help sure it up.

"All of our freshman defenders played consistently. We're looking for them not to turn the puck over and to not be fancy in our own zone. They will also be paired up with more experienced defenders on their line," Mallen said.

The back line of the future

Brannen is 6-foot-2, 195-pound product of Brampton, Ontario. He is a highly touted defenseman with size and offensive skill. The blueliner is also a candidate for the Canadian World Junior team, and is also being considered as a possible NHL draftee in 1999.

"Miljko, Drohan, King, these guys are all top scorers in our league. We just got better players," Brannen said. "We have to tighten up on D, and being able to contribute in any way I can."

Brannen played juniors in Ontario, where he was the assistant captain of his team, and he scored five goals and 21 assists in 31 games. He won the team's top defenseman honors in 1997-98.

"Chris Brannen, he's one of those defenseman you don't really notice much but people will tell you that as a defenseman that is a good thing. He has a good breakout pass and he's good on the penalty kill," Mallen said.

Another major component to this young defense will be the progression of Randy Drohan and how fast and how much he will be able to contribute.

Drohan, a 6-foot-3, 215-pound defenseman with good puck skills from Mississauga, Ontario, played junior hockey in Ontario for four years. Drohan played on the same team with UMass freshman forward Miljko in juniors.

The freshman also played on the Junior All-Star team in 1997-98. Drohan also recorded 17 goals and 52 assists in the same '97-98 campaign.

"We can't be nervous at all. I've played a lot in junior hockey and am just going to come in and try and contribute the best I can," Drohan said. "I think if we play good team defense and just scare opponents, make good hits, and not give them time to make fancy plays in our zone."

Duplessis is a strong young defenseman that Mallen hopes will develop into a superstar.

But he will need some seasoning before hand.

Standing six feet and weighing 197 pounds, the Framingham native attended Framingham High School, where he was a multi-sport athlete.

Shaw is one of the best defenseman in the United States in his age group. He has great size and speed. He too has been talked about as a potential 1999 NHL draft pick.

Shaw is a 6-4, 220 pound native of Jamestown, R.I., where he played for the Rochester Mustangs of the United States Juniors Hockey League. He recorded 14 goals and 30 assists last season and was also a part of the USHL All-Star team.

The UMass defense is rounded out by Finnish defenseman, Toni Soderholm. Soderholm has had a great junior hockey career in Canada and Finland. He has great skill and maturity, and will be starting opposite Stork this season.

Soderholm played in the IFK of the Finnish junior hockey league, where he scored 12 goals and 24 assists. He was also the MVP of both the hockey and tennis teams at Trinity College School.

"As a young team I think we need to get a few goals at the beginning of the season. That will help us a lot. We are striving for that at practice and we are trying to carry that into games," Soderholm said.

The masked man between the pipes

Johnson is a 6-1, 190 pound goalie from Excelsior, Minn. Although an excellent athlete in general, he will only get limited playing time this season behind Helanen.

Johnson played at Minnetonka and posted a 3.25 goals against average and a .935 save percentage. He also earned a career GAA of 2.83 and a .943 career save percentage.

He also acquired all-state honors, MVP honors and all-metro in high school.

Looking to light the lamp

The forwards will also be an important part of this team's success. These young acquisitions will need to be effective offensive threats and thus far they have done so this season.

Bluman is 5-foot-10, 190 pound forward from Amherst, NY. He is a good goal scorer, but is expected to take some time to adjust to the speed of college hockey.

Bluman played B juniors, and finished sixth in the league in goals with 39. He also made the all-star team for that league. He has yet to play much for the Minutemen.

Crumb is a 6-0, 205-pound forward from Winnipeg, Manitoba. A proven goal scorer, he was a runner-up for Canadian National Juniors Player of the Year in 1997-98.

The feisty forward scored 114 points last year including 62 goals and 52 assists. He is a two-time junior league All Star and led his team in scoring in both 1996-97 and 1997-98.

Miljko is a 5-11, 195 pound forward from Etobicoke, Ontario. He has great quickness, and has also been a great goal scorers in juniors in the Ontario league. He is currently trying to overcome a knee injury and recently started his first collegiate game against UNH.

Miljko played in the Ontario juniors league and was an assistant captain on his team last year. He was also team MVP leading the team in scoring with 105 points [62 goals, 43 assists]. He was the second-lead ing goalscorer in the league.

"I want to help this team in any way I can. Whether it's as a scorer, or as a checker. I hope that I can adapt to the speed of the game, and as a team we are going to do a lot better and improve on last years record," Miljko said.

> "We are not looking at this as next year or the year after, we've got to do some damage in this league right now, and get this program winning some more games than six."
> -Joe Mallen, UMass hockey coach

King is the last of the UMass forwards who has been expected to do great things for the Minutemen.

A 5-10, 176 pound forward from Barrie, Ontario, he also has played in the juniors league in Ontario. King has good speed and knowledge of the game and is expected to be a contributor on this year's team.

King finished the 1997-98 season with 103 points. He scored 36 goals and 67 assists in only 49 games. He was third in the league in scoring, and first on his team. He was also the team's all-time leader with 172 points, and also won the teams MVP honors, and an all-star berth.

"Darcy King is an 18-year-old, and he's a goal scorer. He has great hands and vision, he has really impressed us," Mallen said. "He is in the mold of Kris Wallis from a year ago."

Mallen did talk about how the young players were good but he also talked about how he wasn't ready to tab this season a rebuilding year, and that he wants results now, and so do these young players.

"We are not looking at this as next year or the year after, we've got to do some damage in this league right now, and get this program winning some more games than six," Mallen said. "None of these guys want to go through that type of season, most of these young guys were winners where they came from," Mallen said. "He is in the mold of a Kris Wallis from a year ago."

work.

Mallen has have gone to hell and back to try to watch Helanen play in his native country, but it appears like now it was well worth it.

"I'd say we got the right guy," Mallen said.

It sure seems like it.

A chance at the big time

It's only natural for not only Helanen, but all collegiate hockey players, to aspire to play at the professional level one day. However, while it was the drive to play at a higher level that brought Helanen to the United States, and eventually UMass, it may be one that also pushes him back across the Atlantic should there be no pro opportunities in North America following his departure from Amherst.

"That was the plan — either to come to college or play on an elite team," Helanen said. "But I'm going to take it one year at a time. I just want to play well this year. I'm looking forward to our whole schedule this year. We're playing some real good teams, and it's going to be interesting.

"We'll see [about a pro career] after three years," continued the UMass netminder. "It's still down the road."

And for the Minutenien, having Helanen around for a few more years seems like a pretty good propusition.

New coaches climb aboard the UMass ship in the 1998 season

By James Murphy
Collegian Staff

When asked what intrigued him and eventually convinced him to hire Bill Gilligan, Dale Dunbar and Chris Salani as the new assistant coaches of the Massachusetts hockey team, head coach Joe Mallen replied:

"For a long time I've wanted guys with more coaching experience and coaches that the young players could relate to. Both Bill and Dale played at the professional level and that instantly gives them a wide range of credibility, in terms of knowledge of the game."

"In the past we had one coach who went on the road constantly and one who remained here everyday. Both Dale and Bill will travel with the team and be bench coaches in both home and away games," continued Mallen.

DAILY Dunbar

"Dale is going to coach mainly the defense and Bill will help out with the offense. Both coaches along with Chris Salani will be intrigal parts of gameday and practice."

A coaching veteran returns back to North America

Gilligan joins the UMass coaching staff after spending the past 19 years as a coach and general manager in Europe. The former Brown University standout will concentrate the majority of his coaching skills on offense and also special teams.

Gilligan has had a decorated career as both a player and a coach. After becoming the Bears all-time leading scorer, he graduated in 1977 and went on to play for the Cincinatti Stingrays in the World Hockey Association. After that, Gilligan then continued his playing career in Austria and Switzerland for the next six years. He also served as a member of the U.S. National Team in 1978 and 1983.

After a sucessful playing career Gilligan began coaching in Klagenfurt, Austria, leading his team to four Austrian League titles. He also served as an assistant for the Austrian National Team during that time span.

Gilligan spent the next four years coaching the Bern Hockey Club in Switzerland where he led the team to three league championships. From 1992 to 1994, he coached the Swiss National Team. Then, after, a very respectable coaching career, Gilligan became the general manager of the Bern hockey club he had previously coached.

Now in his first season as a UMass assistant, Gilligan hopes to bring his coaching experience from his stints in Europe to this young UMass squad.

"I think I can help this program and hopefully incorporate my experiences into the team strategy," he said. "This is a young team with a lot of potential."

Chris Salani

A native son arrives in Amherst

Dunbar also brings a sucesful hockey career to UMass. A Winthrop, Mass. native, Dunbar is a Hockey East alum, as he played for Boston University from 1981 to 1985. After playing at BU, Dunbar played professionally in both the AHL and the NHL from 1985 to 1990.

Dunbar began his coaching career at Catholic Memorial High School in 1994-1995, as an associate coach for Bill Hanson.

Dunbar then moved on to the junior coaching ranks, becoming the head coach of the Detroit Compuware Midgets. During his tenure in Detroit, he coached the Midgets to a 97-7-3 record. In 1996-97 he served as the assistant coach and later the head coach for the Erie Otters of the OHL. Dunbar will concentrate his coaching skills on team defense.

A youthful point of view

Chris Salani, a consultant for the team last season, enters his first season as an assistant. Salani a native of Hancock, Mich., graduated from Michigan State in 1996. He played two seasons as defenseman for the Spartans. Salani along with his duties as assistant coach, will also help the team with strength and conditioning and administrative duties as he did last season.

When asked what their main gameplan was for this season, the three new assistants replied in unison:

"To keep it simple and forget about the past," he said.

With 10 freshmen on this year's team, forgetting the past shouldn't be hard.

Veteran trio looks to lead the way for UM

Stork, Blanchard and Fitzgerald to captain Minutemen

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

On a team that is dominated by freshmen and sophomores, it's safe to say that juniors Dean Stork and Jeff Blanchard and senior Bryan Fitzgerald are the last of a dying breed.

As three of the few upperclassmen on the 1998-99 edition of the Massachusetts hockey team, it's going to be someone's responsibility to take charge and show some of those newcomers the ropes.

That's where this trio will enter the picture, as together they will lead UMass both on and off the ice this season. Stork will serve as the captain, while Blanchard and Fitzgerald will act as the alternates.

Bryan Fitzgerald

All for one and one for all

One of the first things that is noticeable when surveying the roles of Stork, Blanchard and Fitzgerald is that they are truly the perfect complements to each other on the ice.

Stork is the burly, aggressive, defensive leader, the general of the backline unit for the Minutemen. Blanchard, on the other hand, is a legitimate offensive threat who was second on the team in scoring last year. Finally, Fitzgerald is a fifth-year senior who will be looked upon not only for his tremendous work ethic, but also for his strong presence as a quality defensive forward.

What you will also see between the lines is that they are the veterans, the leaders of this club who know that it is their responsibility to turn this ship back onto the course that it strayed from last year.

"It's a fresh start this year," said Blanchard reflecting back on last year's 6-24-5 mark. "That's the consensus of our team. This year it's not going to be just one guy. We're focusing on more of a team aspect."

The idea of putting the past behind them as soon as possible is something that sounds favorable to the Minutemen. No one wants to dwell on last year's mark, and as far as Fitzgerald is concerned, that shouldn't be a problem.

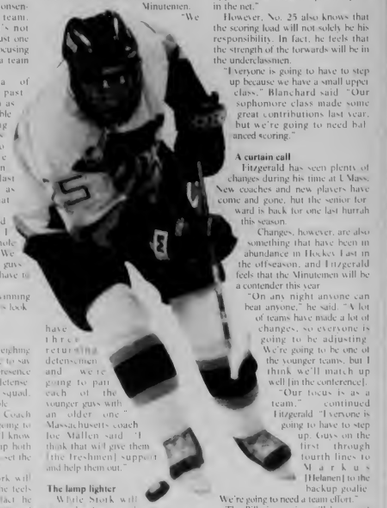
"Being a fifth-year senior and having been here for a while, I can say that it's almost a whole new team this year," he said. "We lost a lot of guys, but the new guys who came in know that they have to do to win."

And getting back on the winning track is precisely what UMass is looking for.

Junior defenseman Dean Stork will captain the 1998-99 Massachusetts hockey team.

The blue line basher

Standing at 6-foot-3 and weighing in at 203 pounds, it's accurate to say that Stork is an intimidating presence to go up against. The junior defenseman will captain this year's squad, and feels ready to accept his role.



"I was really happy when Coach [Mallen] told me that I was going to be the captain," Stork said. "I know that I have to show leadership both on and off the ice and try to set the tone for the rest of the team."

Despite the fact that Stork will sport the C on his jersey, he feels very humbled in his role. In fact, he feels that it will take a combination of leadership from he Blanchard and Fitzgerald to help this team attain success.

"They're the captains too, and they deserve the same amount of respect," he said. "They're both great players and we need them to perform their duties both on and off the ice as well."

The Penticton, British Columbia native is expected to log plenty of ice time for UMass this year. In addition to his regular duties, Stork will also see time on the top power play and penalty killing units. It will also be up to Stork to try to mold a freshman class that will be thrown right into the mix on the backline for the Minutemen.

"We have three returning defensemen and we're going to pair each of the younger guys with an older one," Massachusetts coach Joe Mallen said. "I think that will give them [the freshmen] support and help them out."

The lamp lighter

While Stork will man the beat in the UMass end of the ice, it will be up to Blanchard and his fellow forwards to try to wreak havoc in their opponents' zone. That shouldn't be a problem for the skillful winger who is looking to break out and become a feared threat throughout Hockey East after two solid seasons.

The Stouffville, Ontario product is expected to be one of the team's big guns this season up front. Blanchard has only improved as a player during his first two seasons in Amherst, and this year should be no different.

"We need scoring across the board from a lot of guys," Mallen said. "Jeff Blanchard [and Nathan Sell] as upperclassmen need to put the puck in the net."

However, No. 25 also knows that the scoring load will not solely be his responsibility. In fact, he feels that the strength of the forwards will be in the underclassmen.

"Everyone is going to have to step up because we have a small upper class," Blanchard said. "Our sophomore class made some great contributions last year, but we're going to need balanced scoring."

A curtain call

Fitzgerald has seen plenty of changes during his time at UMass. New coaches and new players have come and gone, but the senior forward is back for one last hurrah this season.

Changes, however, are also something that have been in abundance in Hockey East in the offseason, and Fitzgerald feels that the Minutemen will be a contender this year.

"On any night anyone can beat anyone," he said. "A lot of teams have made a lot of changes, so everyone is going to be adjusting. We're going to be one of the younger teams, but I think we'll match up well [in the conference]. Our focus is as a team," continued Fitzgerald. "Everyone is going to have to step up. Guys on the first through fourth lines to Markus [Helanen] to the backup goalie. We're going to need a team effort."

The Billerica native will be one of the top defensive forwards on this year's squad, and has good quickness and determination. The winger had a goal and two assists in 23 games last season.

Helanen a rock for UMass

Goalie stepping up to a new level

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

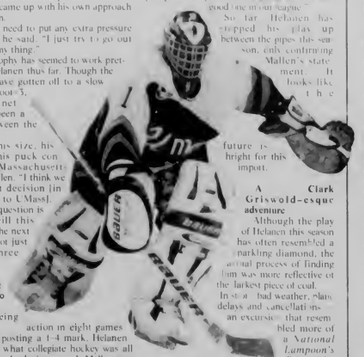
You would have thought that Markus Helanen had a tough task ahead of him when he became the successor to Brian Regan. After all, the sophomore would be stepping into the role played by arguably the greatest goaltender in the history of the Massachusetts hockey program.

However, that fact really didn't seem to phase the Vantaa, Finland product at all. In fact, Helanen came up with his own approach to the situation.

"There's no need to put any extra pressure on yourself," he said. "I just try to go out there and do my thing."

That philosophy has seemed to work pretty well for Helanen thus far. Though the Minutemen have gotten off to a slow start, the 6-foot-3, 205-pound net minder has been a standout between the pipes.

"We like his size, his stance and his puck control," said Massachusetts coach Joe Mallen. "I think we made a great decision [in bringing him to UMass], and my only question is how good will this kid get over the next three years, not just the next three periods."



Getting thrown into the mix

After seeing action in eight games last year and posting a 1-4 mark, Helanen got a taste of what collegiate hockey was all about. Despite the losing record, Mallen saw it as a step in the right direction and gained confidence in the Finn heading into the season.

"Markus played a great game last year against Princeton. We lost in overtime, but it could've ended a little differently," Mallen said. "He also played well against Boston College down there. I thought that he handled himself pretty well.

"He worked hard over the summer and we've worked hard with him on the preseason," continued Mallen. "I think that he's going to be a game who's going to be a real good one in our league."

So far Helanen has stepped his play up between the pipes this season, only confirming Mallen's statement. It looks like the future is bright for this young netminder.

A Clark Griswold-esque adventure

Although the play of Helanen this season has often resembled a rankling diamond, the annual process of finding him was more reflective of the farkest piece of coal.

In-state bad weather, plane delays and cancellations, an excursion that resembled more of a National Lampoon's Family Vacation than a recruiting trip — eventually landed Mallen in Finland after the season had ended. However, Helanen's team was continuing to hold post-season practice, thus allowing Mallen a chance to see the goaltender at

Freshman class looks to have big impact for the Minutemen

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen and his new assistant coaches made a commitment this season to improving the Massachusetts hockey team by leaps and bounds. One of the best ways to do that was through recruiting.

"We're really excited to get going and to start working with a new group of student athletes," Mallen said.

Mallen and his assistants recruited 10 new players to join the UMass squad. They addressed all angles on the ice by recruiting four forwards, five new defensemen and one freshman goalie.

"I think we've had a great recruiting class," Mallen said. "Our progress this season will be shown in our recruiting."

Mallen and his assistants expect that the impact that will be made by this team will be made by the defense.

"When I think of our freshman class, and I don't want to knock our freshman forwards because they're very good, but I think of it in terms of the blue line back. We have five quality defensemen back there," Mallen said.

The new defense consists of Toni Soderholm, Justin Shaw, Luke Duplessis, Ruddy Drohan and Chris Brannen. These six young players are expected to jump right in and contribute on defense by adding to quality players such as captain Dean Stork, Kevin Tucker and Joey Culgin.

"We have several young guys on this defense, and us older guys need to help our freshman build," Stork said. "We need to keep talking to our freshman everyday. Keep things positive, nothing negative. They're a great freshman class this year, one of the best. It's going to take a couple of games to get used to the speed of the games, but once they play a few games they'll be fine."

The Minutemen also recruited four forwards to create more offense. The Minutemen might have just hit the jackpot with these four guys. They recruited Jedd Crumb, Josh Bluman, Darcy King and Martin Miljko.

The best news for UMass is that these four potential multiple goal scorers will get a chance to slowly ease into college hockey, and to learn from quite a productive bunch like sophomores Nick Stephens, Kris Wallis, Jeff Turner and R.J. Gates. They will also learn from experience veterans Jeff Blanchard and Nathan Sell.

"I think that our front, Jedd Crumb, Martin Miljko and Darcy King, they are proven scorers at the junior level, much like Wallis and Turner were a year ago," Mallen said. "They need time in the developing stages. They have speed, and well, goal scoring is a god-given gift, and I think both Crumb and Miljko have that hand-to-eye coordination and skill you need to put the puck in the net."

The Minutemen also built for the future. They brought in goalie Mike Johnson from Minnesota. Johnson was recruited and is liked by the coaches very much, but for now he will get to learn and sit behind stellar starting goalie Markus Helanen.

Turn to FRESHMEN, page HP 3

Finnish import Toni Soderholm is expected to step right in and contribute for the Minutemen at his defensive position.

Former Chilean Dictator awating return home

SANTIAGO, Chile (AP) — Former Chilean dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet will be moved to a hospital nearer an air base where two planes remain waiting to fly him home.

Maria Angelica Cristi, a right-wing Chilean congresswoman who visited Pinochet last week at Priory Hospital in London, confirmed the reports yesterday by local newspapers.

"I was informed that Scotland Yard is looking for a safe place, away from pressures by reporters and demonstrators" for Pinochet to await the ruling on his case by the House of Lords, she said. Chilean newspapers said Pinochet, who turns 83 on Nov. 25, will be moved as soon as tomorrow to a location closer to the Brize Norton air base near London. The Chilean air force has two planes there ready to bring him home should he be released.

Pinochet was arrested Oct. 16 at the request of Spanish judge Baltasar Garzon, who wants him tried on charges that his military government committed genocide.

San Diego Police search for muderer of 9 yr. old

OCEANSIDE, Calif. — Police went door to door yesterday to hunt for a teen-ager they believe stabbed a 9-year-old in a camping area restroom then rushed out as the boy's aunt heard a dying scream. Volunteers scoured the beach in this quiet harbor town with metal detectors, looking for the knife used to kill the Oroville child.

The boy, who was not immediately identified, was at a family reunion Saturday at a campground, and went to the bathroom about 8 p.m., escorted by his aunt.

"We can't find a rhymre or a reason to it," police Sgt. Tom Aguigui said. "The whole department and whole community are in shock."

Police believe the boy didn't know the suspect, believed to be 15 to 17 years old, who vanished into the heavy fog that covered the harbor area about 30 miles north of San Diego.

The boy's family and some friends had come in motor homes and travel trailers to the camping area, a stretch of palm tree dotted asphalt bordered by a harbor channel, a stretch of white sand and the Pacific Ocean.

Suspect accused of using drug to rape UM student

By Lorraine Kennedy
Collegian Staff

An Amherst man accused of drugging and raping a female University of Massachusetts student was ordered held on $500 cash bail after a superior court judge denied the prosecution's request for $100,000 cash assurity.

Leonel Cruz, 22, was arraigned at Hampshire Superior Court in Northampton Friday on charges of rape and indecent assault and battery. He pleaded not guilty to charges that he sexually assaulted a 19-year-old woman on Oct. 12.

Cruz is not a UMass student, but had been "illegally" living at UMass in his girlfriend's dorm room since he moved from Florida to the area one and a half years ago, Assistant Northwestern District Attorney Susan Loehn said in court Friday.

Loehn alleged that Cruz raped the victim while she was rendered unconscious by a "knock-out" drug that he put in her drink at a small party the victim hosted in her dorm room Oct. 12.

When the victim left the room to help a friend who was sick, Loehn alleged that Cruz spiked her drink. The victim fell unconscious after finishing the her drink and, when she woke up many hours later, her pants and underwear were off, her t-shirt was inside out, and the suspect was in the room, according to the prosecutor.

Loehn said the victim fell back to sleep and woke up at 12:30 p.m. the next day. Recognizing the symptoms of having been sexually assaulted, the victim went to University Health Services.

A grand jury found sufficient evidence to indict Cruz on the charges, and he was arrested on a warrant by UMass Police Nov. 10, according to UMass Chief of Police John Luippold.

Due to a case of mistaken identity, however, Cruz was transported two days later to Springfield and was released from custody, according to Cruz's court-appointed attorney Samuel S.R. Gordon.

Cruz then contacted a lawyer and took a bus back to Northampton to turn himself in, Gordon said, emphasizing that Cruz would "be long gone" if he had wanted to run from the charges.

Gordon said there is "nothing more telling" about Cruz's character than how his "main concern" was to contact a lawyer.

Cruz is an "industrious young man," Gordon added, and came up here to obtain an education. If Cruz remains in custody, he said, "he loses all that [financial aid] and loses all those credits [from Holyoke Community College]."

Gordon argued that Cruz has "no roots in Florida and has more roots here." He will be able to stay with his friend in Amherst if he is released, Gordon said, since his girlfriend no longer wants him to stay with her due to the "alleged infidelity."

Loehn, however, argued for the $100,000 bail, saying that Cruz has no relatives in the area and "no real ties" to the community, therefore increasing the chances he might flee before he is tried. In addition, she emphasized that the victim is a student living on campus.

Loehn also said police found a briefcase in the dorm room where he was staying, containing a .22 caliber pistol and 85 rounds of ammunition. Cruz, however, has not yet been charged in the firearms offense, she said.

According to Gordon, the gun and ammunition belonged to Cruz but was locked in his girlfriend's closet.

"The briefcase that the gun was found in was locked and was part of everything brought with him [from Florida]. He worked in some very bad neighborhoods... [doing] cable installation," Gordon said.

Hampshire Superior Court Judge C. Brian McDonald rejected the state's request for the higher bail, saying that he was "impressed" that Cruz not only appeared in court, but also took steps to appear.

In addition, he said, "because this woman would be uncomfortable when she sees him on the street" is not a reason for $100,000 bail.

McDonald said that Cruz may not be released on bail "until special conditions are confirmed." Among the conditions: his living arrangements with a friend in Amherst must be confirmed; his status as a student at Holyoke Community College and as an employee of Chicago Pizza Restaurant must be confirmed.

If he is released, the judge said Cruz is to have no contact with the complaining witness, either direct or indirect, and he must appear in front of a probation officer twice a week.

UMass Police have issued a trespass order against Cruz, forbidding him from campus grounds, Luippold said.

A pretrial conference has been scheduled for Cruz on Dec. 10.

Questions surrounding conviction of Mumia Abu–Jamal continue

By Danielle Fugazy and Laura Forster
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: This is the first article in a series on the case of death-row inmate Mumia Abu–Jamal vs. Pennsylvania.

The name Wesley Cook may not ring a bell for many people, but the name Mumia Abu–Jamal draws an audience with global attention, and has been bringing issues over the death penalty and Pennsylvania law to a boil over the last 17 years.

Jamal, originally named Cook, was convicted of first degree murder of Philadelphia police officer Daniel Faulkner and possession of a weapon of crime by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in July 1982.

However, questions over the events of Dec. 9, 1981, the morning of the shooting, and the trial proceedings, have raised appeals to the case and caused ongoing court proceedings for supporters of Jamal.

Others feel various distortions and misunderstandings regarding the case have fueled the international reaction and that the support of Jamal is unfair.

Most recently, the appeal for a second trial for Jamal was overturned by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania on Oct. 29. Also, Pennsylvania Governor Thomas Ridge — who plans to sign Jamal's death warrant — won re-election on Nov. 3. These events have been the cause of widespread demonstrations from Philadelphia to Los Angeles by supporters of Jamal.

Ridge, who was elected governor four years ago, signed a death warrant for Jamal on June 1, 1995, but it was blocked when courts accepted procedural appeals of the conviction and sentence.

According to the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, Tim Reeves, Ridge's spokesman, Ridge is expected to sign a new execution warrant for Jamal as soon as he has time to review the state Supreme Court ruling.

Weinglass is appealing the ruling once again, sending it to the Federal courts for reconsideration.

Also, according to the Pittsburgh Post–Gazette, Ridge, who has put two men to death in 1995, is mentioned as a possible candidate for the vice presidency in the year 2000.

COURTESY INTERNATIONAL ACTION CENTER
Mumia Abdul-Jamar

The Pioneer Valley alone has been termed by Jamal's lead counsel, Leonard Weinglass, as "a stronghold of support" according to Nick Camerota, media coordinator of the Western Massachusetts Mobilization for Mumia organization.

On Nov. 1, the organization held a fundraiser in Amherst raising $5,000 to help pay for the defense of Jamal.

This Wednesday, another protest will be held in the Springfield Federal Building at 4:45 p.m. in hopes of bringing further consideration to the trial.

Aside from the Pioneer Valley, roughly two dozen protests have taken place in cities and towns of Pennsylvania, according to Camerota.

Justice Cappy, who reviewed Jamal's case and upheld the jury's verdict on Oct.29, said in his written opinion "...there was no error committed here, and thus, nothing which to seek correction."

Forty-four year-old Jamal is currently being held on death row in Pennsylvania's most high-security prison, Greene State Prison.

Iraq agrees to cooperate; Clinton retains threat of "overwhelming force"

By Susanne M. Schafer
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton said yesterday that Iraq must cooperate with U.N. weapons inspectors unconditionally, or Saddam Hussein could again face the punishing military strikes he avoided this weekend by agreeing to work with the United Nations.

"Iraq has backed down, but that is not enough. Now Iraq must live up to its obligations," Clinton said at a quickly called news conference at the White House.

On Saturday, Iraq sent a series of letters to the United Nations that eventually led the White House to conclude that Baghdad was ready to comply with the Security Council-ordered weapons inspections. President Clinton cancelled an ordered military strike against Iraq early Saturday when he received word that Hussein was backing down. If Hussein's government fails to keep its word, Clinton said, overwhelming force remains an option.

"We remain ready to act," he said.

The President said Iraq must allow inspectors "unfettered access" to view any site they wish; it must turn over all relevant documents on chemical and biological weapons production; and it must not interfere with the inspectors themselves.

"The return of the inspectors... is the best outcome, because they have been and they remain the most effective tool to uncover, destroy and prevent Iraq from rebuilding its weapons of mass destruction and the missiles to deliver them," Clinton said. Clinton acknowledged that deep skepticism surrounds Saddam's promises, but he argued that holding back from a military strike is the best long-term strategy.

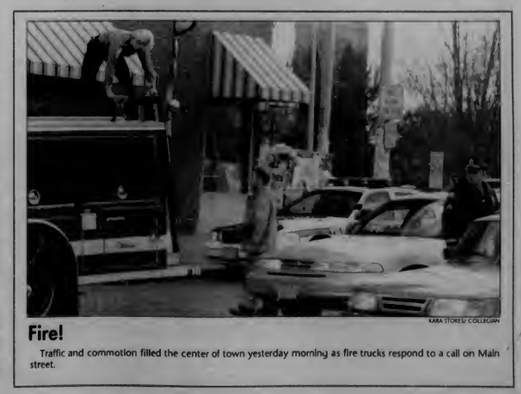
"If we take military action, we can significantly degrade Saddam Hussein's ability to develop weapons of mass destruction and to deliver them," Clinton said. "But that would also mark the end of UNSCOM," the U.N. special commission on Iraq.

With National Security Adviser Sandy Berger, Defense Secretary William Cohen and Gen. Hugh Shelton, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, at his side, Clinton said U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan shares his understanding of Iraq's obligations.

At the United Nations, Annan said Clinton's "statesmanlike response... will be welcomed by the international community." A senior administration official said yesterday that Clinton gave Shelton the go-ahead to begin the operation Friday morning. But shortly before U.S. missiles were to be launched Saturday morning, news reports from Baghdad indicated the Iraqi government was prepared to back down. Clinton put the mission on hold, and attack plans began forming for a later hour.

Arrest made after assault; suspect facing charges

University of Massachusetts Police responded to a report of a disturbance at Gorman Residence Hall Nov. 12 and made an arrest in connection with an assault.



Omari M. Clapp, 19, of 31 Highland Park Ave., Roxbury was arrested and charged with assault and battery, and assault and battery with a dangerous weapon.

According to Chief of Police John Luippold, upon arrival to the dorm Thursday afternoon, police were informed by the victim that he had been assaulted. Police found and identified Clapp and charged him with assaulting the individual with a glass bottle.

Clapp was arrested the previous week for an unrelated incident and charged with accosting and annoying a person of the opposite sex, making annoying telephone calls, intimidating a witness, and daytime breaking and entering for felony with the intent to put a person in fear, according to the UMass police log.

Luippold said Clapp had attempted to contact a witness involved in a criminal case, with whom he has been told not to have contact.

Hutus resettle to escape rebels

By Hrvoje Hranjski
Associated Press

MUCACA, Rwanda — Rwandan officials say they will build new villages for some of the people who fled attacks by Hutu rebels, a first indication of what will be done with 650,000 people displaced by war.

The government has long favored a policy of moving the people, mainly Hutus, from scattered hillside plots into villages where they would be easier to protect — and control.

"The plan is to take these people to their sectors once we are assured about their security," said Alphonse Sharamanzi, a local official, who briefed aid workers and U.S. diplomats about the project on Saturday.

"Following discussions with the communities, they will be put into groups of houses where it is safer for them to be," he said. The plan gained momentum earlier this year when tens of thousands of the people grew tired of giving their own scarce food, shelter and money to the rebels. They knew they would be killed if they refused, so the Hutu villagers left their homes and sought protection from the army.

But similar government-drafted schemes to resettle the Hutus in villages have failed before, leaving thousands of rectangular houses standing empty.

Foreign donors, who are expected to finance most of this project, have been reluctant to respond because of fears the resettlement may not be voluntary. Crowding people into villages also raises questions about changing their cultural and social habits.

Sharamanzi said officials from the Ministry of Transport and Communications had already begun training some of the farmers on how to carve up the land and allocate properties for housing and farmland.

He said Rwandans living in army-protected camps will eventually move to the new villages. Their original houses, most of them built with mud bricks, will be dismantled and moved to the new locations. It is not clear, however, how long the project will last or when the first villages will be erected. But even traditional farmers acknowledge they have little alternative.

"For many of us it is a choice of being killed by the rebels in your field, or look for safety elsewhere," said Appolinaire Abukuli, a 38-year-old Hutu.

Along with 45,000 others who left their family plots for this squalid, makeshift camp, Abukuli said attacks and harassment by Hutu rebels had driven most people away from their homes and food. The rebels are former Hutu soldiers and militiamen responsible for a 1994 genocide of more than 500,000 minority Tutsis and politically moderate Hutus. The killing ended when the Tutsi-led fighters won power in July 1994 and promised a national reconciliation.

States have option in tobacco settlement

NEW YORK (AP) — Public health advocates said yesterday the proposed $206 billion tobacco settlement being reviewed by the states falls short of delivering a comprehensive approach to discourage smoking. But they declined to recommend whether the states should embrace the settlement. In anticipation that the deal will be endorsed, they were mobilizing to make sure states use the money to discourage tobacco use.

"We think it's a positive step forward in the war on tobacco, but it's not the answer and doesn't itself provide a national tobacco control policy," said Diane Canova, speaking for the American Heart Association.

She said federal legislation is still needed to give the Food and Drug Administration authority over tobacco products.

Anti-smoking activist Bill Novelli of the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids said local public health officials were being alerted to make sure the money that would go to the states "isn't diverted to non-public health areas."

"There is going to a huge food fight over these dollars," he said.

Negotiators for eight states and the nation's four biggest tobacco makers reached agreement Saturday on settling remaining state claims for government health costs from treating smoking-related illnesses.

The proposal was then shipped to the 46 states that have suits pending against the tobacco industry or have not yet filed suits, and they were given until Friday to decide whether to sign it. A formal announcement of the agreement was expected today in Washington.

Several state attorneys general said they would not know until reviewing the details whether they would sign.

Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal told The Hartford Courant the agreement appears to have several good features, although it falls far short of the failed $368.5 billion settlement that he helped negotiate in 1997.

"It may be the best we can achieve now," Blumenthal said. "In any event, whether we can settle it or not, the war against Big Tobacco will continue and the settlement will only close a chapter."

Some public health advocates are unhappy that they did not get a chance to comment as the settlement was crafted in private meetings between the states and the industry over the past five months. Mohammad N. Akhter, executive director of the 55,000-member American Public Health Association, said the states should be given another two to three weeks to decide so they can consult with public health experts.

He said the five-day deadline is "absolutely inappropriate. It is enticing people into taking action they haven't thought through."

The industry has not indicated how many states would be needed for it to proceed with the settlement. It is likely the amount of the industry payments would be reduced if states decided against signing.

Four states — Mississippi, Florida, Texas and Minnesota — have already settled with the industry for a total of $40 billion. The $206 billion settlement would be the biggest U.S. civil settlement ever, but would remove an enormous financial and legal threat to the industry should it lose a court case to one or more of the states.

One of the chief architects of the settlement, Washington state Attorney General Christine Gregoire, conceded that the deal fell short of what Big Tobacco's most vocal critics would like. "There is more to be done legislatively, but we think this represents more than they can expect to receive in the courts," she said.

In addition making payments to the states, the industry would commit $1.7 billion to research and programs aimed at discouraging smoking, especially by youngsters.

Boston City Council tries to stop keg parties

BOSTON (AP) — Boston city councilors are still trying to brew up a way to control college students' beer bashes.

As alcohol-related incidents have been increasing at universities locally and nationwide, the Boston City Council has been trying to regulate drinking among students.

Recent attempts have had mixed results, The Boston Herald reported.

Kegs of beer are popular with students because they are cheaper than cases of beer. But councilors worry that students can get kegs too easily, and they're considering a proposal that would require residents to get a city-issued permit before having a keg delivered.

Some students say they would circumvent any new rule by picking up kegs with their own cars.

"That (proposed) law wouldn't do anything," said Bryan Serony, 24, a senior at Boston University.

Last month, Mayor Thomas Menino vetoed a proposal that would have required residents to get a city-issued permit before buying a keg.

He said the proposal would conflict with state laws that already regulate keg sales.

The council has been trying to control student drinking since Scott Krueger, an 18-year-old Massachusetts Institute of Technology freshman, died after drinking too much alcohol at a frat party last September.

In 1991, the town of Amherst adopted a bylaw that required residents to get a city-issued permit to possess a keg. Police can do a background check before signing off on the permit.

But it's unclear whether residents abide by the law. Only 70 permits were issued last year in a population of 35,228 including 23,500 undergraduate students.

Students always try to find a way around regulations, Kevin Dennis, manager at Marty's liquor store, told The Boston Herald. In 1987 Massachusetts passed a law prohibiting a resident from taking more than one keg at a time from a liquor store. The regulation was designed to prevent students from throwing bashes with hundreds of guests and multiple kegs.

Indonesian students killed by police while protesting

By Christopher Torchia
Associated Press

JAKARTA, Indonesia — President B.J. Habibie tightened security around his palace yesterday and warned that violent student protests that have engulfed the capital would only delay democratic change.

An aide to the president said Habibie would stick by his military chief, despite outrage over the shooting deaths of at least five students in clashes with riot officers.

Police, meanwhile, took two opposition figures from their homes for questioning after the president ordered the military to get tough on those he has accused of trying to overthrow his 6-month-old government.

The activists are former political prisoner and politician Sri Bintang Pamungkas and retired Lt. Gen. Kemal Idris, who has campaigned to replace Habibie with a transitional government led by a presidium of community leaders.

Two other pro-democracy activists were questioned Saturday and later released.

The streets of Jakarta were quiet yesterday after rampaging mobs burned buildings and cars and attacked police during riots a day earlier that were triggered by the killings of the students. Several security personnel, pro-government civilian guards and others also were killed, bringing the death toll to at least 16 since Thursday.

The unrest was the worst in the Indonesian capital since May, when much heavier rioting swept the city and helped unseat authoritarian leader Suharto after three decades in power. Mobs vented their fury at the military, shouting taunts and hurling stones at police vehicles. At Parliament, thousands of student protesters shouted slogans against Gen. Wiranto, head of an armed forces tainted by human rights abuses.

But presidential aide Dewi Fortuna said yesterday that "it is unlikely that the president will fire Gen. Wiranto because it is not his style."

In a meeting with local journalists yesterday, Wiranto expressed regret for the shootings of the students and promised to take action against officers involved.

Backed by armored personnel carriers and small tanks, Wiranto's troops ringed the presidential palace and Parliament. One stick-wielding mob roamed as close as a few blocks from the palace. Students planned to resume protests today against Habibie, a one-time protege of Suharto who is promising democratic reforms but is suspected by opponents of maneuvering to stay in power. In an interview with Cable News Network, Habibie said the mob unrest, much of it carried out by youths with no apparent political agenda, would only impede democratic change. Student violence has been largely confined to stone-throwing at troops.

"Demonstration must not mean burning houses or shops, killing other people. That is not the aim of any kind of democracy," Habibie said in the interview broadcast yesterday. He suggested that students had been manipulated by his opponents.

Students timed their demonstrations to coincide with a meeting last week of the nation's highest legislative body, the People's Consultative Assembly, which agreed to hold parliamentary elections in May or June and make other political reforms.

The assembly, filled with holdovers from the Suharto era, lacks credibility among students.

Yesterday, about 20 students wearing black armbands laid wreaths at the site of a clash where their friends died.

Good Sports?

Oh, to be an athlete. I should have played a team sport involving a ball of some kind, instead spending my time in stinky boxing gyms. Apparently, being good at team sports gives you a license to do whatever the hell you want. I'm not just talking about a certain basketball player who allegedly felt the need to almost go the full monty before proving his manhood off the court.

No, it seems that athletes everywhere have become used to the idea that physical skill gives you freedoms not allowed other mortals. In every pro sport, and increasingly at the college level as well, we have seen star athletes get away with crimes most of us would be sent to prison for. Not that this attitude or behavior extends to all athletes: the vast majority of students who play sports for the University bust their asses to fulfill their academic and athletic commitments, and should be admired for their dedication. However, there are exceptions to every rule.

"It is the sports fan who has created the modern athlete as a god, and then has the audacity to be amazed when the players' huge egos make them think they can get away with murder."

Paul Martinez

The most obvious reason why some top athletes are given so much freedom is simple: money, and lots of it. Controversy about a player's off–the–field behavior, at least in the pros, brings publicity, and this ultimately means more tickets sold, and more team merchandise bought. In the college ranks, the money is just as important, although this fact is covered under the glorious ideal of athletic competition. Although players (supposedly) receive no monetary compensation for their efforts, the administration does, and good teams are a big business.

Here at UMass, for instance,the basketball team is mindbogglingly profitable for the University. Huge amounts of money are brought in every year by ticket sales, TV and radio broadcast rights, and merchandise related to the teams. The amount of money earned, especially in ticket sales and team paraphernalia, is directly related to how well the teams do. Because of this, top players become commodities to college teams, just as top players in the pros serve as draws for the teams they play on. For instance, do you really think the Bulls will be as popular as they were, without Jordan and Pippen on the team? By the same token, how many people would come to UMass games and spend their money if the team sucked?

Does this sound reasonable? Sure, until you realize that the money a star player brings in makes them too valuable to kick off the team for almost any reason. This type of thinking goes on in athletic offices on college campuses all over the country. Top players are treated like kings because of the monetary income their athletic skill provides. No coach in his right mind is going to kick a starting player off the team just before the season starts, unless he wants to spend the rest of his career washing jockstraps at a community college.

Money is the primary concern of any administrator, and star athletes on top college teams have privileges most of us could only dream of. Last year I saw a top player on a UMass team hop out of a rented Lexus, gold chain bobbing as he ran into the bank. Not that I care; hell, with the amount of money these guys bring in, they deserve a piece of the pie. At the same time, these privileges do not give immunity.

So who is ultimately responsible for the behavior of our star athletes? Of course, the players themselves have a lot to answer for; they choose their actions. Should we blame the administrators, blinded by dollar signs, who run the athletic programs? Before you make judgments on the coaches, who are busy trying to keep a player on the field while they wait for his court date to come up, ask yourself who's cheering as that same player makes another touchdown. Is it you? Do you cut athletes some slack for their personal idiosyncrasies just because they're athletes?

Think about it. We may have been disgusted when it came out that Robert Parrish beat his wife, but hey... he's the Chief, right? What about Tyson? Despite the fact that he's a wife–beating rapist who is too violent even for pro boxing, we again allowed him to fight; he eventually bit off Evander Holyfield's ear to stave off another well–deserved beating. Tyson, of course, has recently had his boxing license reinstated. Why? You guessed it — money from the 50 dollar pay–per–view fights that people will pay for to see Tyson beat the stuffing out of some chump club fighter.

In a way, we encourage and reward this type of behavior. It is the sports fan who has created the modern athlete as a god, and then has the audacity to be amazed when the players' huge egos make them think they can get away with murder. We have put up with inflated ticket prices, egos, and player salaries for too long. Many of these guys have the audacity to charge for their autographs, citing the fact that someone may sell it for money — as if a multimillion– dollar contract doesn't supply enough.

Still, we'll all watch plenty of college ball games this season, especially with the prospect of no NBA games until next year. When Tyson fights Holyfield, I'll watch — but only on regular TV. There won't be any suspense, but at least I can see Tyson get smacked around with a clean conscience.

Real life lessons

Every time I walk to my social science "diversity requirement" anthropology class, I can't help but wonder how the bums are doing over at Campus Convenience, right next to Boston University, which is my former college and place of dwelling.

Located directly below Warren Towers, a monster BU freshman dorm, Campus Convenience grocery store was a hub for people from all walks of life, students and professors, city people and lost tourists.

The store was a mirror of extremities maxed out in the city: rich college kids from far away countries, maintenance men, and homeless people looking for shelter. It was nothing more than a regular convenience store, really, which offered bagels, fresh coffee, munchies and other items. Despite its normal appearance, Campus Convenience in fact had a culture, and was fondly called " Cam-co" by everyone.

"I was less surprised at his lack of table manners than I was about my own assumption that everyone knew how to use silverware."

Natty Yagudin

Caught up by phone bills my freshman year at BU, I decided to take up a job at the store. While working there, I'm also convinced that I completed a 3-credit diversity requirement.

Not all the workers in the store were college students. Most were, in fact, people that by all accounts would be called strange. Many of them hardly attended high school, and seemed to have no direction at all in their lives. Cam-co was just a stop in the course of their wanderings around the country, another job to hold on to in order to survive the month. They stood in church in front of God and everybody and exchanged vows. What I felt with her as she gave birth to our children was so overwhelming that I have no special way of describing it. Love. I can't see how a man could raise a hand against his wife or abuse his children after that experience with them.

Just a few years after the birth of our second daughter, my wife died in a traffic accident caused by someone who put her own convenience above everyone else's safety.

Seventeen years have gone by. My children ran off as many prospective stepmothers as my bad habits, but I don't think I could ever feel an attachment so intensely again.

When the elder of my two daughters brought her young man to talk to me, it all came back to me. He's a pretty good man, my son–in–law. The only promise I extracted from him (and intend to hold him to) was that he be with her when the time comes. My eyes turned into waterfalls again when they stood up in church in front of God and everyone and exchanged vows.

And now, as I resume my role as a University of Massachusetts student, I think about my neighbor, her new baby, and her family and I feel enormous respect — as I feel for my young fellow students who are soon to follow — and for that 25–year–old TA who didn't believe in love and reminded me that now, as ever, I guess don't know what I don't know.

Martin Reddy is a UMass student.

Love — exciting and new

The last time I saw her she was nine months pregnant. I almost didn't recognize my neighbor at the next table as I sat down for lunch at a local restaurant. Then she let loose with a big, bright smile that spread a lot of warmth on a wet, cold day in November. After exchanging a little small talk and wishing all the best for the new addition to her family, I remembered an odd turn one of my classes took last year.

Something possessed a 25–year–old graduate student to hold forth on the subject of love for the edification of his 300–level Spanish class. "It's really just an illusion, especially for young people. It simply serves the propagation of the human race." A very sharp, very fine–looking and well–mannered young woman seemed to roll her eyes a little as she said, "Oh. You think?"

Martin Reddy

I flashed to one of the most heroic events I ever witnessed.

My wife was not quite twenty–one and had spent the last nine months carrying our first child. At first she didn't think the inconveniences of child–bearing would cause her any difficulty. "Some women just like to complain because it gets attention," she said. She would be different. Stronger. Then she got sick in the morning and I followed her lead and she said "What the hell's wrong with you?"

As she got bigger, she would struggle to find a way to get comfortable enough to sleep at night. She never really seemed to succeed.

Then she started moving everything around. First it was the kitchen. I had to get myself reoriented a couple of times because she had reorganized the cabinets. One weekend she had me pushing furniture all over the place "rearranging." She turned into a neat–freak, and to this day I can't leave glasses, coffee cups or any clutter lying around.

We didn't do LaMaze or anything like that, but she insisted that I be present in the delivery room when the time came. I protested that the hospital staff didn't want that kind of thing. I would just get in the way. She was ahead of me there. "I checked. It's okay and you are going with me." As the blessed event approached, I kind of hoped she would forget about it.

She didn't. I found myself in scrubs in the delivery room in the middle of a night in May with my knees shaking like hell, more scared than I had ever been in my life. She refused medication, which didn't help me any, either. She held to the attitude that women had done this naturally for thousands of years. She squeezed my left hand in her right. She screamed and my hair was standing on end and I asked her doctor, "Can't you stop it?"

Without looking up, the doctor — herself a young woman of 30 or so — said, "She's doing fine. Take my word for it." Then, "You have a fine daughter," and I heard our child cry. Before I could make sense of it all I found myself holding our baby. Despite those awful masks, I could see bright smiles in the eyes of the doctor and staff. I realized my own eyes had turned into waterfalls. I gave the baby back to my wife. We kissed and she said, "My hair's a mess."

Love? The place was flooded with it. "You ought to go to opthomalogy and get those eyes popped back in their sockets," the charge nurse told me. I walked outside for a short while. The sun had come up and the whole world had become something different since I had become a father.

Twenty–nine months later we went through this again. This time, though, my wife's attitude towards anesthesia had changed. "Load me up," she said.

Like many young men I thought I already knew what love was when I stood in church in front of God and everybody and exchanged vows. What I felt with her as she gave birth to our children was so overwhelming that I have no special way of describing it. Love. I can't see how a man could raise a hand against his wife or abuse his children after that experience with them.

Just a few years after the birth of our second daughter, my wife died in a traffic accident caused by someone who put her own convenience above everyone else's safety.

HASA–CASA gala a success

On Saturday, Nov. 14, the Haitian American Student Association (HASA) and the Dominican student association (Casa Dominicana), celebrated the 5th Annual Hasa–Casa Cultural Gala. This year's theme of the event was Hispaniola, "The Flower of the Caribbean."

The night consisted of a traditional Haitian–Dominican dinner, a historical overview of the Dominican Republic and Haiti, performances by both organizations' dance groups, Cayena and Negres Kreyole, and music entertainment by Concepto Latino and DJ Deville.

"But Hasa–Casa shouldn't take place once a year. It should take place everyday in the lives of the student body," Gregory Casimir, a senior psychology major said.

Ceylin Guillermo

Hasa–Casa is an event that was started five years ago. It was created because of many misconceptions that people have about Dominican–Haitian relationships. This event not only targets Haitians and Dominicans but also the entire University community as well as the off–campus audience.

Saturday's event started by giving the audience an opportunity to taste the traditional foods of Haiti and Dominican Republic. The dinner was followed by a warm welcome by the chairpersons of both organizations: Francellis Nunez of Casa Dominicana and Etienne Esperance of HASA. They introduced the guest speaker, Dr. Silvio Torres Saillant. Saillant is the director of Dominican Studies at City College in New York. He gave a historical overview of both countries, starting from the time of the Spanish conquest to the present unity between Haitians and Dominicans here on campus.

"It is a great pleasure to be here tonight and seeing how students are celebrating their cultures, showing the unity of the island the Hispaniola," stated Saillant.

Saillant's historical overview was followed by performances by Cayena and Negres Kreyole.

This is a part of the event that the audience always looks forward to when Hasa–Casa is ever mentioned; that is because both groups incorporate the audience in their performances. Not only did Cayena and Negres Kreyole entertain the audience with traditional folklore from both countries, but they also did so with a joint dance.

"Hasa–Casa was everything we expected it to be and more. Cayena and Negres Kreyole showed the audience that even though Haiti and the Dominican Republic are two different countries, they are very similar in their dances and that was shown in the joint dance," Nilda Charima Mangual, UMass senior education and Spanish major said.

The party started with the music provided by Concepto Latino and DJ Deville, who entertained the crowd with music from both cultures.

"Hasa–Casa is one of the best events on campus during the fall semester, not only does it give Dominicans and Haitians an opportunity to unite, but also to other students to learn about both cultures," Raquel Gonzalez, a junior communication disorders major said.

"It was a good turnout, I enjoyed it a lot. Not only did they play music from both Haiti and Dominican Republic but I also felt represented because they played a couple of Cape Verdean songs and Hip–Hop. This gave other people who are not of Haitian or Dominican descent an opportunity to dance to their music also. I am looking forward for next year's Hasa–Casa," Cipriano Andrade, a sophomore philosophy major said.

Eddy Mejia, a junior computer information systems major who is of Haitian–Dominican descent, said, "It is so wonderful to see students put on such a great event. I had a great time seeing both of my cultures united in one night. I hope that this continues for many years to come."

Overall Hasa–Casa was a tremendous success. Students had the opportunity to enjoy a great event by learning culture, political and social issues that concern Haitians and Dominicans.

"But Hasa–Casa shouldn't take place once a year. It should take place everyday in the lives of the student body," Gregory Casimir, a senior psychology major said.

"All of us, Haitians, Dominicans, Asians, Africans, Native Americans, should all work towards breaking down those stereotypes that divide us all."

If you wish to get involved in either organization, you may do so by contacting HASA at 545–3405 and/or Casa Dominicana at 545–0054. Or visit the office at the Student Union room 404. Look forward to Dominican Independence celebration and Haitian cultural night next semester.

Harvest Night wins big for charity funds

Rahilya Napoli
Collegian Correspondent

The African Student Association (ASA) hosted its Second Annual Harvest Night on Nov. 14. The night's program included a slide show about Africa, ASA history, and information about past ASA members and events. Dances were performed by the Nigerian Youth Dancers and the ASA UMass Dancers. NYC+1, the Kotoko Cultural Dance Troop, poetry reading, a fashion show, and a dinner consisting of traditional African food were also part of the night's festivities. The purpose of the program was to help raise funds for the victims of the bombing in Nairobi, Kenya.

The audience was welcomed by Ruth Adusei, the President of ASA, who introduced the night by giving a brief history of the ASA organization and the event itself.

"ASA has been an RSO at UMass for almost 30 years. It was created by African students for African students and all others interested in learning about Africa and its people," said Adusei. This event was one of many that are put on by ASA to fulfill this mission.

The slide show that consisted of pictures of different places in Africa, past events hosted by ASA, and past members of ASA, was designed to educate the audience about Africa, its culture and its people, and about ASA and its members.

"I loved the slide show because it reminded me of home and set my mind to be receptive to the rest of the night's presentations. I especially liked the pictures about Africa," UMass freshman Fesume Teshome said.

The slide show was followed by the Kotoko Cultural Dance troop, which entertained the audience with traditional African drums and dances. The troop included several drummers and a dancer. The sounds were very traditional and the moves of the dance were very provocative.

"The dances were sexy, yet very traditional in origin," UMass senior Angela Osei–Mensah said.

A dinner followed the dance. The foods were from all over Africa and included both staple foods, like rice and chicken, as well as exotic and special event foods like sambusa and kaitesi.

"The food was delicious and it represented different parts of the African continent," UMass sophomore Adesina Olowu said.

The food was cooked by ASA members earlier that same day.

The Nigerian Youth Dancers, of which two of their members are UMass students, performed two traditional dances.

"The dances were eye–catching and very involved. I loved seeing the two male dancers' extremely nice torsos," UMass freshman Kamilya Napoli said.

Another dance performance was put on by ASA UMass students.

"Their dance was invigorating and cute," UMass senior Ruth Adusei said.

Another performance was by Boundary. This performance was a mix of poetry reading and dance. The group had two performers, one who sat and read the poetry, and one who performed the meaning of the poem. It was very entertaining, but also educational.

"I was moved by both the words and the movements. I thought that they did a beautiful job of giving life to the words," Amherst College senior Jamila Saha'i said.

The show continued with a poetry reading and ended with a fashion show. The fashion show included casual, elegant, and African cultural wear.

"The fashion show was beautiful, it was elegant, and it was fun," UMass senior Cassandra I. Carty said.

On the whole, the event was deemed a success by those who attended.

"It was a very successful event because all the objectives for the night were met. Our objectives were to raise funds for the Kenyan relief fund, to educate the community, and to raise a cultural awareness among all people. Most importantly, it was to bring together the people in the continent and those in the diaspora," Adusei said.

The night came to a close with thanks from all ASA members, and an invitation to dance to music from different parts of Africa like "zouk," "sukusu," "ta'arab" and "soukuss."

"I love African music because it has such an integral part in today's western music and shows that American music would not be what it is today without the input of African music and dance," UMass sophomore Sheila Jones said.

The ASA is open to all those who are interested in learning about Africa and its people and culture. For all parties interested in joining the African Student Association, you can attend meetings held every Sunday at 5 p.m. in the Campus Center, or call Ruth Adusei at 546–3573.

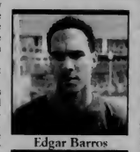
Euro has set standard

On Jan. 1 1999, 11 European countries — nearly the entire continent — will surrender all monetary responsibilities over to a Central European Bank located in Frankfurt, Germany. On July 1, 1999, all monetary functions will operate using the "ero." The euro will become the uniform currency in Europe.

How does this affect me?

There are enormous benefits to be gained from the use of a single currency in Europe.

Low inflition will be a primary benefit for many smaller, developing nations such as Portugal, Spain, and Luxenburg. During hard times, when the economies of these countries would ordinarily struggle, the power of stronger economic countries such as Britain, France and Germany will help support their fellow European nations.



A larger, more diverse, unified European economy will allow the euro to compete, and possibly even supersede, the dollar and the yen.

In my opinion, the most important benefit of this European currency agreement is the brotherhood built through the alliances. Communication networks have been opened tremendously! The psychological attitude of, "we can do it," has been established.

The next move, following in the footsteps of the currency agreement, would be a unified military. This unified European military will make it possible for Europe to stand up with the best militaries in the world — primarily, the United States military.

Control of the United Nations would definitely not be as one–sided (US dominated) as it is now. The olden days of great European power–houses would be revisited. Confidence and hard–nosed negotiations would no longer be a thing of the past.

Obviously the next move would have to be a "United States of Europe." Kind of far–fetched? Maybe.

Edgar Barros

But I'll tell you one thing that is certainly not far–fetched, Europeans are decades closer to a "United States of Europe" than Africa is to a "United States of Africa."

The African continent and its leaders need to wake up and smell the stupidity. Mergers are the wave of the future. Everyone from large corporations to the 11 European countries have realized how to get ahead — join forces, pool your resources, and band together. This is what we need in Africa.

A single African currency would greatly benefit the people and economies of Africa. Countries who struggle to keep inflation down, or struggle to keep the bank systems going, can lean on countries like South Africa and Nigeria until they get back on their feet.

With the US dollar, the Japanese yen, and soon the European euro, African currencies do not stand a chance.

A unification of Africa is unmistakably imperative. In order for a powerful Africa to ever re–emerge, unification is the key. And the way to start is the exact method the Europeans have implemented — one single currency.

This is the way!

The euro has set the standard!

"With a strong financial foundation, there is nothing that Mother Africa cannot do. It is the richest continent as far as natural resources are concerned."

With a strong financial foundation, there is nothing that Mother Africa cannot do. It is the richest continent as far as natural resources are concerned. The amount of unexploited wealth in Africa saddens me. African leaders need to put aside personal differences and do what is best for Africa and her people — UNITE!

Europeans are well on their way to reclaiming their position as world powers, why can't we (Africa) do the same?

An energetic Tori brings her choir songs to Mullins

Tori Amos performed at the William D. Mullins Center last night.

TORI AMOS
William D. Mullins Center
Nov. 15

If one managed to get past the stiff security at the Mullins Center, and stifle the yawns induced by the unfortunate opening act, Unbelievable Truth, the treat was a syrupy dose of Tori sugar. As always, she offered up her insides on a silver platter in addition to a well rounded three course meal with the help of a full three piece accompanying band.

The appetizer consisted mainly of newer songs from Boys For Pele and From the Choirgirl Hotel with the exception of "Precious Things" which started the set. "Past the Mission" set the tone for the main course and found Tori alternating between the piano and keyboard. Included in the ingredients was a little "Sugar" which was preceded by an anecdote on the song's origination.

It wasn't until the band departed that the fans were allowed that special sort of intimacy of a girl and her piano that we all miss from her solo days. She abandoned the plugged aspect of the performance for "Cloud on My Tongue," prompting a few Zippo torches to flare up. The size of the venue distanced the audience from the subtleties of this and other quieter songs. It caused some those who were fortunate enough, to reminisce about her club performances, before she became a rock star.

The body of the show ended with extended versions of such notable singles as "Crucify" and "Spark," which fueled the roasting fires and ignited the audience. The highlight by far, though, was an almost unrecognizable version of "Waitress" which proved that some songs can be enhanced with a little electricity.

The dessert started with a little "Cocaine" and "Raspberry Swirl." The second encore was a tasty three songs, ending with "Pretty Good Year," the final cherry on top of the sweet icing made by flickering disco globes and a crooning Amos. The show left the crowd with a full belly and a satisfied smile.

The before-dinner breadsticks, Unbelievable Truth, may not have exerted the same type of energy displayed by Tori, but were more interesting and intense than on their ho-hum debut album, Almost Here. Opening up with "Solved," Andy Yorke, brother of Radiohead's Thom Yorke, led his band through their nine song set. "Same Mistakes" was one of the few songs performed from Almost Here, others include "Who's to Know," "Landslide," and a cover of Mark Mulcahy's "Ciao My Shining Star." The band had a few obstacles to overcome, one of them being the uninterested audience and another being the overbearing bass courtesy of the soundboard operator.

In a brief interview after their set, Unbelievable Truth said "It's hard to say" who their influences are, but among them are a band called Hugo Virgo, and director Hal Hartley. Drummer Nigel Powell admitted that he is a fan of Hartley, and that the band's name comes from one of his films. "There's no cosmic reason why we chose that particular film," he said. Yorke says that their second album is "much darker" and that they will mature as a band in their live shows because they have gotten "more confident as musicians."

Salon of George Sand recreated at Benzanson

By Justin Lynn

THE SALON OF GEORGE SAND
Benzanson Recital Hall
Nov. 14

Chopin and Liszt afficianados were treated to an evening in a nineteenth-century Paris salon Saturday night in the Benzanson Recital Hall. Pianist Virginia Eskin and soprano Paulina Stark set the stage to resemble the salon of George Sand, friend of Chopin and Liszt. Eskin and Stark, dressed in evening gowns indicative of the scene, performed the shorter "salon" pieces with powerful energy and undeniable talent.

The evening began with works from Frederic Chopin (1810–1849). Some impressive solo piano pieces by Eskin included "Etude in C-sharp minor, Op. 10, No. 4" and the last Chopin piece performed "Tarntella (composed at Nohant)." Eskin relayed that Chopin had written the piece with an English children's game in mind which involves pushing a hoop around a stick to keep it rolling; the analogy added a delightful picture to the energetic piece.

Stark joined Eskin to sing two pieces in Polish, including "My Darling (Mickiewicza)" and "Handsome Lad (Zaleskiego)." Stark sang these pieces back-to-back, offering a hearty taste of the Polish language.

Stark and Eskin then performed a couple of pieces by Pauline Viardot (1821–1910), including "Cancion de la Infanta (poet unknown)" and "Les Filles de Cadix (Musset)." These pieces provided a powerfully sad bridge to the latter portion of the program.

The music of Franz Liszt (1811–1886) rounded out the evening. Eskin began the tribute with a gentle piano solo, "Liebestraum No. 1 in A-flat major." Stark then joined in for a romantic couplet of "La tombe et la rose (Hugo)" and "Die Lorelei (Heine)." Finally, Eskin concluded the evening with an intense, riveting performance of "Liebestraum No. 2, in E major", followed by "Transcendental Etude in F minor."

Tricky fails miserably; Swedish band Whale delights Pearl Street

By Matthew Nixon
Collegian Staff

TRICKY/WHALE
Pearl Street
Nov. 14

Many thanks to Whale for opening this show and making the night somewhat bearable. The Swedish band's half-hour set was a whole galaxy away from what Tricky would later do on stage. It was a short and very sweet set from the band who are touring in support of the musically-varied "All Disco Dance Must End In Broken Bones."

A pre-show interview with chanteuse Cia Soto revealed that the set would be all about "rawk" and not touch on the more dance-pop tunes on their new CD. Whale are so much fun live. Drummer Jurgen climbed on his kit to bang away, guitarist Jon amused the crowd with wacky theatrics and Cia, in a plastic cowboy hat, slinked around the stage like a cat.

At one point, the guitarist told the crowd that they had spent the afternoon at the University of Massachusetts. The crowd cheered. He asked the crowd if it was true that the Pixies got their start there. The crowd erupted again. One of the band members then asked if they should cancel the show because of "so much rock in the air."

The band spent a lot of time at UMass, recording a session at WMUA and attending a fraternity party after the show. Highlights were "Hobo," "Two Chord Song" and "Deliver The Juice." Then the good times ended.

Tricky wimped out. He lacked any stage presence and the set was just plain boring. He spent much of the show with his back turned to the crowd smoking joints before stepping up to the microphone to essentially speak his lines.

When his face was visible, it was either bathed in red light, or had an image projected on it. Glow-in the dark paint was all over the place; on the bassist's fingernails, on Tricky's eye-lids, Martina's neck, the guitarist's arm.

There was a minimum of lights, and the music was very atmospheric. Beats and bass lines plodded along under Tricky's stories. The near sold-out crowd stood for most of the time and craved the few moments when the

The magician work of Tricky failed to fool the Pearl St. audience.

"The league is so tight this year. It's very similar to last year," said junior alternate captain Jeff Blanchard, who netted the game winner on Friday. "On any given night anyone can beat anyone."

It's a new squad that takes the ice for the Minutemen this season. The coaching staff has employed a defensive system that is paying dividends, and Helanen has been consistent in every outing so far.

"Last year I didn't see a team. I saw a lot of individuals," Mallen said. "If this team plays together and plays unselfishly, then this team can go a long way."

The final verdict

It's pretty certain that Maine coach Shawn Walsh respects the Minutemen after watching UMass at work this weekend. Another irony, though, was that a two-game total of only 4,349 fans were in attendance to witness one of the biggest two-game series in recent memory.

"They're [UMass] a very intelligent, very disciplined, very well-coached team," he said. "They're a difficult team to play, especially at home, but if they can only get 2,000 people a game, then maybe they shouldn't be in our league. Maybe they should be a Division III team."

Pretty harsh words from Walsh. After all, now that it seems like UMass is becoming a quality program in Hockey East, it would be nice to get the support like fellow conference squads Maine, Boston University and New Hampshire.

So anyone who wants to make Walsh look like a joker, the seven game homestand continues Saturday night at 7 p.m. against Union.

an equally strong negative point to hold the Minutemen down. The dark clouds have followed UMass from game to game, waiting for a tiny slip to support their beliefs.

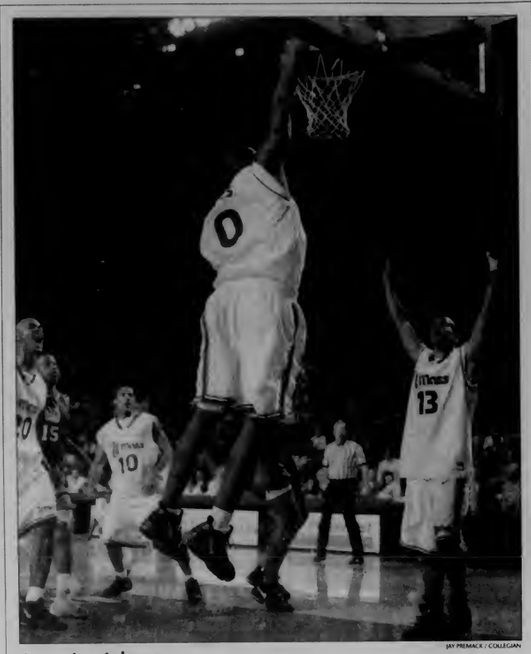
After this weekend's 55-34 beating of the Maine Black Bears, though, the money is down, the fans believe, and most of all, the players see national acclaim only a game away, heading into next weekend's grudge match with Connecticut.

Just ask Maine coach Jack Cosgrove.

The Minutemen played the game coach Mark Whipple had been waiting for. It was a sound performance, where both sides of the ball showed up with their "A" game. After sacking Villanova 11 times, Maine's defensive line was held to zero on the afternoon. After four interceptions and no passing touchdowns for quarterback Todd Bankhead vs. Rhode Island, he threw five scores on the conference's best pass defense. After Royston English ripped up Delaware for 180 yards, he only had 76 on Saturday.

Maine had no answer for the Minuteman onslaught, as 20 points in the fourth quarter made the game look close on paper.

The stage is set for the grand finale with neighboring Connecticut at home on Saturday. The Minutemen want to avenge a 44-41 loss in Storrs. The winner takes the New England division of the Atlantic 10.



After UConn's 34-26 victory at William & Mary this weekend, it seemed like fate that Saturday's game would have to have an impact on the divisional race. A loss was only a minute away, one that would drop the Huskies out of contention: but UConn scored two touchdowns in that time to come away with a victory.

UConn fell into a deep hole when UMass visited their place, yet came away with a victory. Hmm... all too familiar.

UConn's earlier comeback and a return visit to Amherst conjure up the ghosts of the Miracle at McGuirk, when, in 1996, UConn had a 19-point lead with 12:38 left to go, only to see Jeff Smith and the Minutemen come marching back to cap an emotional senior day with a 39-38 victory.

If that's not an indication of what's to come, then I don't know what is.

Fans, see you Saturday. You won't be disappointed.

goal as a Minutewoman and in the Olympics. "The ball rises and then it dips. It's hard to defend."

Also hard to defend were Penn State's stickwork and speed, two factors that made Lammey and senior midfielder Heather Gorlaski potent weapons for the Lions.

"They have speed, but they also have really good stickwork," UMass senior back Laura Phelan said. "We didn't move our feet a lot and we got pushed to the outside."

Lammey, the Big Ten offensive player of the year, was a major reason UMass had to play a defensive-heavy game. The senior forward led the Lady Lions this year with 19 goals and 20 assists, and became an even more important offensive weapon against the Minutewomen after second- leading scorer Meagan Gallie broke her collarbone in the conference tourney.

Gorlaski, the Big Ten player of the year, also stepped up to handle offensive duties.

"Missing Meagan put a lot of pressure on Dawn," Morrett said. "And Heather did a good job in getting into the attack."

That combination put a significant challenge to UMass' defensive corps, which starts two sophomores and two freshmen.

"They came together as a unit and they had a never-say- die attitude," Shea said, marking off positives of her team's performance.

The Minutewomen also put a solid attack on the Lady Lion end zone, but several close tries just missed their intended mark.

Less than a minute into the second half, senior forward Erica Johnston lofted a shot toward Penn State goalie Jamie Smith, but Smith was able to bat the ball away.

Ten minutes later, sophomore Kristen Schmidt was just out of reach of a Johnston cross in the Lion circle.

UMass got its first — and only — penalty corner try at the Penn State cage with 12:34 left in the contest. But the Minutewomen's No. 1 option, an Anke Bruemmer strike, was saved by Smith.

Saturday's game marked the close of five collegiate field hockey careers as Phelan, Johnston, Putnam, Kerry Lyons and Browne played in their final contest.

"I can't explain what it feels like to have been a part of a successful program like this," Phelan said.

The crowd reacted to singles such as "Christiansands" with whoops and cheers, but seemed dead bored by the time Tricky said goodnight. Prepared for an encore and possibly a rendition of Tricky's powerful take on Public Enemy's "Black Steel," the crowd booed the technician who announced the band would not be returning to stage because of a problem with the sound.

Tricky's co-vocalist, Martina, was plagued by feedback while she delivered her lines. Tricky and the band made it through the set, before speedily returning to their bus. Unfortunately, Tricky's swift departure resulted in his not honoring a previous promise to give The Collegian an interview. Tricky's music does best on the stereo and not in a club. UM water polo returns to Cali

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

They have done it again. The No. 11 Massachusetts men's waterpolo team is heading back to the NCAA championships.

Their win qualifies UMass to play at the NCAA championships in Newport Beach, Calif. on December 4-6. With their recent wins over Queens and Bucknell, the Minutemen improve their record to 27-4 and 9-1 in the Collegiate Water Polo Association.

UMass was heading into the Eastern Water Polo Championships having dominated the eastern competition, and this seemed to be prevalent in their semifinal game against Bucknell, where they disposed of No. 17 Bucknell 11-2.

Bucknell was able to keep the match close until the third quarter, when UMass scored five goals to Bucknell's one.

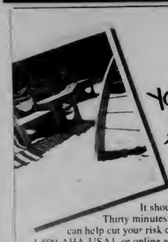
The Minutemen's All-American Brian Stahl scored four of UMass' 11 goals. The other goals came from all over the place. Chad Filiault scored a two-point goal, Gabriel Marrero scored one along with Brook O'Neill, Greg Trayer, Timmy Troupis and Aldo Roman.

In goal, the Minutemen had a platoon system. Richard Huntley made the first six saves as the starter. Then, after the game was well in hand, J.R. VanderWall came into the game to acquire some big game experience, and made six saves of his own.

The win qualified UMass to play in the Eastern Championship final against No. 13 Queens, which proved to be a much tougher match for the Minutemen. The Minutemen received a sudden-death overtime game-winning goal from junior Rich Slingluff to defeat Queens 11-10.

Marrero, Roman, Slingluff and Stahl each tallied two goals for the Minutemen. Other contributors included, Cory Koencmann, O'Neill and Troupis, who each netted a goal of their own.

Huntley received all of the work in the final as he recorded 11 saves. He was also named to the All-Tournament first team.



Also receiving honors for the Minutemen was Roman, who was also named to the All-Tournament first team.

Stahl was named to the All-Tournament first team, while also receiving the tournament Most Valuable Player award for his six-goal performance.

The Minutemen look to return to the Final four, where they placed fourth last year. They also are looking to set their goals higher into a possible battle for the National Championship this year by possibly qualifying for the Final game in Newport Beach.

The Minutemen's next competition is at a club tournament in the Bronx, where they will battle for the U.S. Water Polo Winter National Championships on November 20-22.

Women's basketball uses team effort to down St. John's in season–opener

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

In the first game of its regular season, the offensive attack of the Massachusetts women's basketball team looked very similar to that of last year's team.

Last year's squad used a balanced attack, with everyone contributing to the point total. There was no one star that opponents could single out to shut down. Each night there was a new hero of the game.

In Saturday's 83-66 defeat of the St. John's Red Storm, the Minutewomen used a rotation of players that allowed the entire bench to register minutes and had all but two players score.

"We have a lot of runners on our team, and once somebody gets tired, we don't have to go down in talent," junior guard Alison MacFarland said. "It's just a great team to play with right now. We are all very excited, because we think that we've really got something here."

Five players scored in double digits for the Minutewomen. MacFarland had a team high of 14, and was followed by sophomore guards Kathy Coyner and Kelly Van Huisen who each chipped in 13 points. Senior Tez Kraft and junior Jaywana Bradley rounded out the top five with 10 points apiece.

Van Huisen had perhaps the most complete game, ending with seven assists, two steals and five rebounds, although she committed six turnovers.

The Minutewomen were unable to pull away from St. John's in the first half, ending it just four points ahead, with the score at 39-35.

"The first half was not about us not playing hard," coach Joanie O'Brien said. "When you look at how many free throws we missed and how many layups we missed, it was a four-point lead at halftime and it probably could've easily been 15."

The Minutewomen seemed to come out hungrier and more aggressive in the second half, UMass began to step up its offense and increased its lead. After a scoreless first half, Coyner took control with just over 12 minutes to go. She scored seven straight points in less than a minute, to put the Minutewomen up by 14.

At the 12:09 mark Coyner hit a three, making the score 55-45. She quickly followed that with a layup, and then was able to nail two free throws.

"We came out with the mentality in the second half that we were just going to run them [St. John's] into the ground," Coyner said. "We got out and ran, and they got behind, and just couldn't come back."

UMass had its biggest lead of the game at the 1:24 mark. Van Huisen hit a jumper that was followed by two Coyner free throws, to put the team ahead by 25.

The Red Storm made a valiant effort to stay in the game. They attacked the Minutewomen from behind the arc, hitting 5-of-8 in the second half. Freshman guard Gianni Bowles had a game high 23 points, including 4-of-9 three-pointers. Senior guard Ebony Dickinson hit 3-of-4 from behind the arc for St. John's ending the game with 14 points.

The game was an unusually high scoring one for the Minutewomen, who have not scored over 80 points since the '96-'97 season.

Neither team, however, shot particularly well. Both took a total of 64 shots in the game, with UMass connecting on 25, and St. John's connecting on 21. The difference for UMass seemed to come at the free throw line. The Red Storm committed a total of 26 fouls to UMass' 17. The Minutewomen hit 27-of-35 free throws, while St. John's got just 18 attempts, connecting on 14

UMass will return to action again tonight when it travels to Chestnut Hill to take on Boston College. Today's game will be the season-opener for the Eagles. They have played two exhibition games, losing one and winning the other.

B.C. returns three starters from last year's squad, including two All-Big East conference selections. Junior guard Cal Bouchard, a first-team selection, led the team in scoring last year, averaging 16 points per game. Senior center Whitney Steele, a third-team selection, led the team in rebounding, pulling down six a game, and was second in scoring with an average of 14.1 points per game.

Lead guard Coyner gives women's b-ball a boost

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Kelly Van Huisen and the UMass women's basketball team started the season strong with a win at the Mullins Center over the St. John's Red Storm.

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The final score was quite convincing in the Massachusetts women's basketball team's 83-66 rout over St. John's on Saturday, but at the half the game was still up for grabs.

With the Minutewomen clinging to a 39-35 lead, it was evident that somebody was going to have to step up her game, and put together a consistent run.

UMass had to look no further than to starting point guard Kathy Coyner, who played the role of a leader to perfection.

Coyner failed in the first half to ignite the offense in her second career start at point guard, scoring no points, with no assists.

"I knew we needed to start running more, and that I had to take control of the game to help us win," Coyner said.

After hitting a pair of free throws early in the second frame to put UMass up 41-37, Coyner became more confident in her approach, and began to make her impact.

Coyner made her first spectacular play of the season when she took Telisha Warner off the dribble and into the lane, where she hit a side-winding lay up for a 48-40 advantage.

While that play put the Minutewomen in solid standing, Coyner followed by firing a pass through two Red Storm defenders into the hands of Tez Kraft under the hoop, who passed to Nykole Smith for an uncontested lay-in.

While the UMass offense was now flowing more coherently, the lead remained at seven with just over 12 minutes remaining.

At that point, Coyner put the proverbial key in the ignition and drove UMass home. With 12:09 remaining, Coyner, left alone behind the arc, drilled a three-pointer for a 10-point bulge, and then hit a 17-footer one minute later to put UMass up 57-45.

Coyner sealed a personal 7-0 run with two free throws, and UMass never looked back. The lead eventually reached a high of 25 points, but it was clear that Coyner's play demoralized the Red Storm, a team coming off a six-win season.

With much of Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien's rotation unsettled at this juncture, Coyner put at least one of O'Brien's concerns to rest.

"We need leadership and ball control from Kathy," O'Brien said. "She gave us that and more in the second half."

O'Brien had stressed to Coyner throughout the preseason that she needed to establish her own style of play, instead of trying to imitate the previous starter, Sabriya Mitchell.

Mitchell graduated after last season as the all-time assists leader at UMass, obviously leaving big shoes to fill.

"Sabriya was my mentor, and I learned so much from her," Coyner said. "I am ready to fill the void, but I am going to have to do it my own way."

As a backup to Mitchell last season, Coyner played well down the stretch and helped UMass to the NCAA tournament.

Coyner averaged 7.0 points per game and 1.8 assists per game in '97-98, and with vastly increased playing time, those numbers will undoubtedly continue to rise.

And if she produces similar offensive explosions to the one displayed on Saturday, UMass will see many more close games catapult into easy victories.

Players working hard for Bruiser; hoops squad to play Niagara today

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

After the players had been scrimmaging for a while at Friday night's practice at Curry Hicks Cage, men's basketball coach Bruiser Flint called his squad over to the sidelines, where the group huddled around their mentor.

After Flint spoke to his Minutemen, they hurried back out onto the floor, where they began firing off free-throws.

"Eleven out of fourteen," the coach yelled as he proceeded to sit down in the front row of the stands behind the near- side basket. Monday the team was to travel the short distance from the Cage to the William D. Mullins Center, where they would take on Niagara in the first regular season game of the year, and Flint wasn't satisfied that his bunch was ready quite yet.

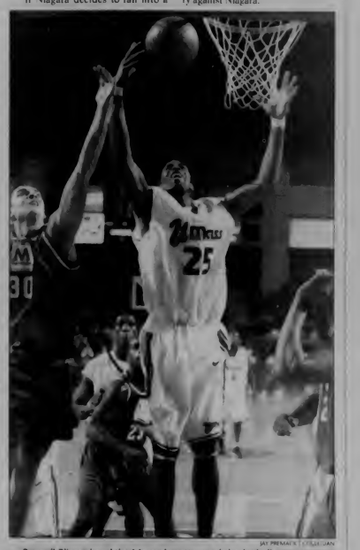
"They shot 11 out of 14," Flint said later, explaining the collective team goal. "They missed twice, and then made it. Then the last [drill], each guy goes and takes a foul shot, and if they all make it, they don't run. If a guy misses, they run some more."

All in all, the Minutemen ran eight to 10 court-length suicides in less than 33 seconds apiece.

If the team doesn't outplay the Purple Eagles, they'll certainly outlast them, which will come in handy against an underrated Niagara team.

"They got most of their guys back from last season, if I'm not mistaken," Flint said. "They're returning a lot of people, and they've got decent size, too."

Niagara returns three of its starters, but not its coach. Joe Mihalich takes the reigns of the team for his first season. Mihalich is expected to cover UMass with zone defense.



"In the zone, it depends on how many shots you hit. Wake Forest is a perfect example of that," said Flint, citing another collegiate matchup. "They shot the Temple zone down in the first half. In the second half, Temple went man, and they couldn't get a shot off."

Massachusetts should be able to handle either defense, as the foursome of guards, Charlton Clarke, Monty Mack, Jonathan DePina, and Rafael Cruz, along with redshirt freshman forward Ronnell Blizzard, have established themselves as quality outside shooters in the preseason.

Cruz hit two out of three from three-point land against Marathon Oil in the last Wednesday's preseason tune-up. Clarke obtained a reputation of being a clutch shooter in a 24-point effort against Rhode Island last year, as his buzzer- beating three-pointer forced overtime, and his three free throws forced double overtime.

If Niagara decides to fall into a man-to-man coverage scheme, Clarke and DePina can dump the ball into the middle to All-American candidate Jan Ketner or power forward Ajmal Basit, who poured in 16 points in the first UMass preseason game against Team Fokus.

Still, a common adage in sports says that hard work breeds championships, and if that is true, just the running that the team did Friday will drive the Minutemen to a victory against Niagara.

UMass hockey stuns No. 4 Maine

Helanen's play leads UM to big Hockey East wins

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The UMass hockey team finally put it all together this weekend at the William D. Mullins Center when they tangled with the No. 4 Maine Black Bears on two consecutive nights.

The Minutemen (2–4–1, and 2–2–1 in Hockey East) defeated the Bears 2–1 on Friday, before tying them on Saturday 1–1. With the three points and the win the Minutemen collected this weekend in Hockey east play, they have won as many Hockey East games already this season as they had by January 31st last season. The improvements keep coming for this young team, and they're coming along nicely and quickly.

The story for the Minutemen in this weekend's upset of a highly touted Maine squad was defense and goal keeping. The Minutemen knew that Maine would be tough to contain, but the young UMass defenses did a fine job. They contained All-American Steve Kariya, and held him to only one assist all weekend.

Maine did put on the pressure, by tallying 90 shots in two nights. However, UMass had its own secret weapon, Markus Helanen, in net, who will not be a secret for long in the Hockey East. Helanen made 88 saves in two night's work, and only allowed two goals in two games.

"I always like to play the game in my head before I go onto the ice. I got lucky a couple of times, but I think our defense did a great job tonight," Helanen said.

"I felt optimistic about this game. I felt that we were ready to take them on," UMass coach Joe Mallen said. "This is a great group of guys and they work really hard and play well together. I hope this is a sign of good things to come."

The Minutemen began the weekend with a goal from Sophomore Kris Wallis 21 seconds into the first period on Friday night. Although this goal didn't stop the Maine onslaught of shots it did seem to set a tone. But only a 1:21 later, Tuomo Jaaskelainen scored a goal for Maine to tie the score at one. Jaaskelainen's goal came against Helanen, his former teammate on the Finnish juniors team, but for Helanen that would be his last error of the night.

The score would remain tied until early in the second period, when Jeff Blanchard received a pass from Nathan Sell in a short-handed situation and tucked the puck past Alfie Michaud (Maine's goalkeeper).

"I thought when he [Blanchard] gained possesion that he was just going to dump it in and end the shift, but he made the extra effort and got the goal," Mallen said.

The score remained 2–1 in favor of UMass, due to Helanen turning away shot after shot that Maine was throwing at him.

"We won this game on the strength of Markus Helanen, you've got to give him the credit. He came ready to play and he willed this one to happen," Mallen said.

Maine's last opportunity arose with just 12 seconds remaining. The puck went in off a Maine player's skate, but the goal was disallowed because of a stick in the crease, as well as the fact that it was kicked in.

The Minutemen were not finished stunning the highly ranked Black Bears just yet. UMass stepped onto the ice in front of it's largest crowd this season of just over 2,500 and tied Maine 1–1.

UMass and Maine played to a scoreless first period, but in the second someone finally came through with a great individual effort. Jeff Turner skated down the left side of the ice and slid the puck out in front to the slot, where captain Dean Stork was waiting to bury the first goal.

The scored remained 1–0 after two periods until 6:02 into the third, when Kariya finally broke into the scoring column by assisting on a goal by David Cullen, which tied the score.

"We played a courageous game tonight, and to take three out of four points from Maine is incredible, and I just hope we can be consistent," Mallen said.

From that point on, it was Helanen's job to preserve the shutout, as he stopped 15 shots in route to saving the point for UMass.

"Markus is really making a name for himself in this league, and I'd say he had a pretty good weekend," Mallen said. "But the rest of the guys also played really good defense. These guys are playing well in the system, and I believe we can go a long way, guys like Söderholm, King and Brannen, these guys are coming along nicely."

The Minutemen will take their two-game unbeaten streak back onto the ice against Union this Saturday night at the Mullins Center.

Sixty minutes later, however, all of that was thrown out the window. The Massachusetts hockey team came into the night looking for respect, and ironically, on Friday the 13th, they got it at the hands of Maine with a 2–1 victory.

"I felt optimistic about this game. I felt that we were ready to try to take it to them," Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen said. "This is a great group of guys. They work hard and they play together, and I just hope that tonight's win is a sign of good things to come."

Oh, and by the way, the Minutemen [2–4–1, 2–2–1 in Hockey East] then went out the next night and tied Maine 1– 1 to take three of four points from the highly-touted Black Bears.

"My first thought is that this is probably the biggest weekend since we restarted the program," Mallen said. "To take three of four points from one of the top teams in the nation is a great feat for the kids and the program."

The brick wall

If you look at the shot total for the two games, you would've thought that Maine thumped UMass much like it did in a two–game set up in Orono last winter. The Black Bears pelted UMass netminder Markus Helanen with 89 shots over the weekend, of which the sophomore allowed only two goals.

For a team that has struggled offensively so far, it seemed like Helanen would have to come up big if UMass was to challenge Maine. Boy, did he ever.

"Markus is making a mark not only in our league, but across the country," Mallen said. "Eighty–seven saves and only two goals is a pretty good weekend. Plus we've been supporting him with good team defense, and it all starts with that."

The aftermath and what lies ahead

Saturday night's 1–1 tie just proved that UMass is a legitimate team, and not the league doormat that the other eight Hockey East schools thought they could beat up on, which was the case last year.

Minutemen football creams Black Bears; UMass drives Maine's Fein to the ground

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Everything sacred fell on Saturday when the No. 10 Massachusetts football team hosted the Maine Black Bears to try and avenge last year's 49–6 loss in Orono.

Maine fell, being clobbered by UMass by an embarrassing 55–33 score that was never even that close.

"We came out and moved the ball pretty well on offense and did some good things on defense ..." UMass coach Mark Whipple said. "They did what I asked them to do, and we kind of got on a roll."

Maine's pro–prospect quarterback Mickey Fein fell, mostly at the hands of blitzing Minutemen, four of whom recorded a sack on the afternoon — each one seemingly more punishing than the last. Leading UMass tackler, linebacker Matt Dawson, victimized Fein with a crucial interception late in the third quarter.

The Massachusetts record for receiving yards in a season fell, as Jimmy Moore's 41–yard catch in the second quarter propelled him over Tim Berra's 922 yards, a mark set back in 1973. His 107 yards on the day put him at 995 for the season.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Matt Jordan

Moore's second touchdown of the game also moved him into a tie for Berra's 12 receiving scores, tying that record as well. In his first season playing for UMass, Moore has moved into a tie for the top career mark in that category, pulling even with current teammate Kerry Taylor, whose touchdown reception in the third frame gave him 12 in his illustrious career.

On the ground, Marcel Shipp exploded for 270 rushing yards and three touchdowns, continuing his unparalleled success and forcing the Massachusetts single–season rushing record to fall. His 1,692 yards this year cleared the former record of 1,631, set by Garry Pearson in 1982.

Probably more important than any of the things that fell, though, was one who did not. Quarterback Todd Bankhead, bruised and battered through a number of rough games, including last week's low point at Rhode Island, a game in which the star passer threw four interceptions in a 23–13 defensive win, stood up strong in the face of adversity.

"[Maine's] going to play eight or nine guys in there [near the line of scrimmage] and we told our receivers and we told Todd that we have to make something go on the outside and he did a great job and our guys caught the ball," Whipple said. "We just had a different approach than we had last week."

Bankhead returned to form against the Atlantic 10's best pass defense, as he lit up the skies for 353 yards and 5 touchdowns against Maine, both ranking among the top single–game performances in history.

With seven seconds remaining in the first quarter, Bankhead evaded a strong Black Bear rush to launch an off–balance rocket over the shoulder of Maine free safety Ernie Swolto to wideout Adrian Zullo, who engulfed the toss in stride and sprinted the rest of the 37 yards needed to get into the end zone.

Lennard Byrd was the next Bear to fall victim to a pin–point Bankhead bomb, as Moore gathered the floater in for a 41–yard gain on UMass' next possession. The completion set up a 12–yard scoring strike between the two on the next play.

From there, the Minutemen steamrolled through the game, collecting points in handfuls. After Maine's standout wide receiver Drew O'Connor pulled in his first of three scoring receptions on the day, UMass fullback Matt Jordan rumbled 36 yards into the end zone on a screen pass to mark the next time Massachusetts got the ball.

Fein's second of four touchdown passes on the day brought the score to its closest point all game, but the Minutemen wasted no time burying the threat.

"At 20–14, I thought we had a chance to win the football game, but obviously we couldn't stop them," Maine coach Jack Cosgrove said. "As much as we tried to get in it, if you can't stop somebody, you're not going to catch up."

Bankhead controlled the Maine defensive backfield until the fourth quarter, when Shipp took over the responsibility. Including an amazing 82–yard touchdown dash straight through the center of the Black Bear defense, the All–American candidate covered almost 200 yards in the final period alone.

With a complete offensive and defensive domination in a single game now behind them, the Minutemen are primed to play the game of the season, against arch–rival UConn next Saturday.

The victories had not been convincing, save a 24–point rout of Buffalo. The injury bug has not frequented the Minuteman training room. The football has bounced their way on occasion, yes. But the bottom line is, the Massachusetts football team has been winning.

Skeptics remained when New Hampshire's Shawn Maclean's field goal veered left of the upright, and after the Minutemen needed 23 points in the second half to beat Rhode Island. They refused to put their money on the Minutemen.

Tenth in the country, yet still coming off a 2–9 season. Eight victories, yet still 10th in the conference in pass defense. Hey, somebody could exploit that weakness and blow them out of the water.

They are for real.

Yes, lady luck had indeed supported the Minutemen on their return to prominence. But UMass, through it all, has found a way to win, whether it be by a point or 30 points. Still, for every positive, there seemed to be

PRINCETON, N.J. — On paper, Penn State's field hockey team dominated Saturday's NCAA tournament first–round game against Massachusetts at Princeton University's Class of 1952 Stadium.

The Lady Lions garnered 12 penalty corners to UMass' one and they forced Minutewoman goaltender Zowie Tucker to make 14 saves on the afternoon.

On the field, however, the Minutewomen put together one of their finest defensive performances of the season and made the Lady Lions fight for every opportunity.

Unfortunately for UMass, Penn State was able to connect on one of those chances, winning the contest 1–0 and sending the Minutewomen home for the second year in a row.

"We had to play a lot of defense," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "When you play that much defense, something is eventually going to give."

What eventually gave for UMass was its penalty–corner defense, as the Lady Lions aggressively earned nine second–half corners.

And on the first corner of the second half, it appeared that Penn State had found a hole to break through. With assists from Tracey Larson (hitting out) and Dawn Lammey (stopping), Traci Anselmo fired a shot past Tucker and the Lady Lions erupted.

Minutes later it was UMass' turn to cheer, after Minutewoman Vicky Browne challenged an official and the goal was disallowed because it did not cross the line under 18 inches.

Ten minutes after Penn State's false alarm, the Lady Lions gave their fans real reason to cheer when Anselmo rifled a near mirror image of her earlier shot past Tucker to lift her team to a 1–0 edge with 19:27 remaining in the game.

"It was supposed to go to [Tucker's] feet," said Anselmo, the Big Ten defensive player of the year and Big Ten tournament MVP. "But when I saw her, I went to her hands. There was a great push out and I just kinda went up and smacked it."

"We knew their penalty corner shots were good," Tucker said. "And it was a rocket."

But the shot was not a simple one to guard against.

"It's called a banana shot and it's very difficult to stop," said Shea, who played

Students plan rally to protest U.S. activities in Iraq

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

The Radical Student Union (RSU) had a meeting last night to plan a rally against the government's action in Iraq this Friday.

The "speak–out," which will be held on the Student Union steps at 11 a.m., will be followed by a "symbolic–direct action," according to members of the RSU. Members did not want details of the action released publicly.

Josiah Cambell, a member of the RSU said, "I'd like to see some dissemination of interest about Iraq. But an active dissemination rather than a passive one." He added that he'd like to see the group do more than flyering.

According to an Associated Press article yesterday, President Clinton said if Iraq does not cooperate with United Nations weapons inspectors unconditionally, Saddam Hussein could again face the punishing military strikes he avoided this weekend by agreeing to work with the U.N.

The article also said Iraq sent a series of letters to the U.N. on Saturday that led the White House to assume Baghdad was ready to comply with Security Council–ordered weapons inspections.

Clinton cancelled an ordered military strike against Iraq early Saturday when he received word that Hussein was backing down.

Clinton said, "we remain ready to act."

Cambell said the U.S. is one of the powerhouses in the U.N. and it bullies other countries in order to benefit itself.

"The U.S. is one of the largest consumers of oil and petroleum. It's in the U.S.'s importance to have a country they can subordinate and get oil at a lower cost," he said.

Cambell said the current sanctions against Iraq prevent medicine and food from coming into the country.

"We are doing this to raise awareness of exactly what the embargoes and sanctions are for. The U.S. is not hurting Iraqi leadership, they're hurting the everyday people of Iraq," he said.

"We're making them more dependent, more under our thumb. It's like, 'if you want food give us this oil at a low price.'"

In the Associated Press article, it states that Clinton said Iraq must allow inspectors "unfettered access" to view any site they wish; it must turn over all relevant documents on chemical and biological weapons production; and it must not interfere with the inspectors themselves.

"If we take military action, we can significantly degrade Saddam Hussein's ability to develop weapons of mass destruction and to deliver them," Clinton said.

Cambell said it is hypocritical of the U.S. to invest Iraqi's chemical and biological weapons, when it has an equally dangerous arsenal of weapons.

He also spoke about the media's role in Middle East issues.

"Islam Awareness Week was last week — does anyone know that? It is common to point the finger at an Arab person. Arabs are perceived as only terrorists," he said.

"Maybe they have a reason for their animosity towards the U.S. I absolutely don't condone it, but maybe the acts of terror are backed by what they themselves have been through."

The media, he said, tries to create fear by making all people of Arab descent the enemy.

"That way," he said, "Everything the U.S. does is justified. We want to present the other view."

The rally will include a speaker, whose name Cambell did not release, who will read George Bush's speech during the Gulf War, with "added sub–dialogue."

Cambell added his thoughts on war in general. "The rich pick the wars and it's the poor that fight them," he said.

Collapse may be near for Russian banking

MOSCOW (AP) — Facing widespread bankruptcy, Russia's banks prepared themselves for a stream of lawsuits from Western partners yesterday when a three–month moratorium on foreign debt repayments ended.

Analysts say debts estimated at more than $6 billion may deal a fatal blow to half the country's 1,500 commercial banks.

On Aug. 17, the government announced a 90–day moratorium on commercial debt payments in an effort to keep Russian banks from collapsing. The move only postponed the showdown, however, since the government failed to persuade foreign investors to drop their claims against Russian banks.

The situation is grim for individual Russian bank customers, most of whose accounts have been frozen since August. The lawsuits are likely to bankrupt weaker banks, or may force them to use their scant funds to pay off Western creditors before paying out Russian accounts.

Two of Russia's creditors, Deutsche Bank and Lehman Brothers, have already filed suit against Russian banks. And Russian media have reported that other banks have hired the international corporate investigative firm Kroll Associates to locate foreign assets of Russian banks.

AIDS victim banned from his hometown

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court turned down an appeal yesterday by a transsexual who says a Pennsylvania judge banished him for life from his hometown after he tested positive for the AIDS virus. Raul Valentin argued that he should be allowed to pursue a federal civil rights lawsuit against the judge who he says "unlawfully sentenced him to life away from his home and family." "It's the most outrageous case of abuse I've ever seen," Valentin's lawyer, Don Bailey, said before yesterday's action. The Supreme Court let stand lower court rulings that said the judge had full immunity from Valentin's case.

Valentin was arrested in Lebanon, Pa., in 1987 after an altercation at a local swimming pool. A transsexual who had been taking injections to enhance his breast size, Valentin was wearing a bikini at the time.

A local magistrate sentenced him to 30 days in jail for disorderly conduct. While in jail, he was tested and found to have the human immunodeficiency virus, or HIV, which causes AIDS. Valentin said he then was taken before a different judge, G. Thomas Gates of the Court of Common Pleas, who ordered him to leave town and never come back.

According to Valentin, Gates said that if he ever returned, the judge would find other charges to bring against him and would see that he was sent to state prison.

Is Mumia Abu–Jamal guilty of murder?

Lack of mitigating circumstances results in his death-row sentence

By Danielle Fugazy and Laura Forster
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: This is the second article in a series on the case of death–row inmate Mumia Abu–Jamal vs. Pennsylvania.

According to the most recent decision by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, Mumia Abu–Jamal is guilty of first degree murder in the Dec. 9, 1981 shooting of Philadelphia police officer Daniel Faulkner. Justice Cappy reviewed the case and upheld the jury's decision on Oct. 29, 1998 in his written opinion.

In Pennsylvania, the jury is asked to return a verdict of death if the aggravating circumstance outweighs any mitigating circumstances. According to Justice Cappy's opinion, there was only one mitigating circumstance. Jamal had "no previous significant history of criminal convictions." The jury returned a verdict of death and the fact that Jamal had no previous criminal record was outweighed by the death of a police officer — Faulkner.

In Pennsylvania, the murder of a person of particularity, such as a police officer or a pregnant women bears more weight in a crime than if it were a civilian killed.

The aggravating circumstance was the killing of Faulkner, a police officer in the line of duty. According to Pennsylvania Assistant District Attorney Arlene Fisk an aggravating circumstance makes the crime of a more serious nature.

"The most recent aggravating circumstance passed by the legislature was in 1982, for people committing crimes against pregnant women," said Fisk. If the crime that Jamal is charged with happened to be against a civilian then it would not be punished as harshly.

Jamal was also found guilty of possession of an instrument of crime. The fact that Jamal's gun was licensed does not make a difference.

"Licensed or not licensed, as soon as a weapon (a gun in this case) is used with the intention to employ it criminally it becomes an instrument of crime," said Fisk.

On direct appeal in 1989 the court affirmed the judgments of sentence and in 1990 Jamal requested the Supreme Court review his case, but was denied. In 1995, the Post Conviction Relief Act court dismissed Jamal's motion for discovery, but granted his request for an evidentiary hearing. Then, a month later, the PCRA court granted the request for a stay of execution.

Jamal wanted the court to take additional testimony from Veronica Jones, a 20 year–old prostitute who the defense claims was a "newly available witness." According to Jamal's petition, Jones would provide important "new" evidence explaining that days before she took the stand as a defense eyewitness, Philadelphia police officers contacted her while she was incarcerated on felony armed robbery charges where they threatened and coerced her to change her testimony.

A hearing was held on this matter and the court found that the testimony of Jones did not constitute "after– discovered evidence" and even if such evidence could be incorporated her testimony was of such an incredible nature it would not provide relief of Jamal. Jamal tried appealing two additional times after this without success.

Justice Cappy also expressed his opinion that Judge Sabo did a fair job.

He wrote, "the judges hostility and bias towards Abu–Jamal were notorious," but Jamal "relies upon several newspaper and magazine articles which criticized Judge Sabo's behavior during the PCRA proceedings. The opinions of a handful of journalists do not, however, persuade us that Judge Sabo's decision to remain on the case was in error."

Clinton says troops ready if Saddam Hussein falters on word

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Skeptical that Saddam Hussein will keep his word, the White House pressed for a swift test of Iraqi promises to cooperate with U.N. arms inspectors. The United States stopped its military buildup in the Persian Gulf but warned it could strike "at a moment's notice."

"The world is watching Saddam Hussein to see if he follows the words he uttered with deeds," President Clinton said yesterday. "Our forces remain strong and ready if he does not."

Reinforcing Clinton's statement, National Security Adviser Sandy Berger said that if Iraq does not comply, "there will be plenty of opportunity for military force."

The administration said it would be up to U.N. chief arms inspector Richard Butler and his team to judge whether Iraq, in fact, allows unrestricted access to all sites the inspectors choose. "He's not been shy in the past about expressing his views when he believes his work has been obstructed," White House press secretary Joe Lockhart said. Butler is to return to Iraq today. With tensions cooling, Clinton took the morning off to play golf. The White House also resumed plans for a presidential trip at midweek to Japan, South Korea and Guam that had been put off as the United States moved toward attacking Iraq.

Speaking to reporters, Clinton said the best outcome would be to get the inspectors back on the job with "unfettered access and full cooperation."

Since the Gulf War, U.N. inspectors have forced Iraq to destroy 40,000 chemical weapons, 700 tons of chemical–weapons agents, a biological weapons plant, 48 missiles and 30 warheads fitted for chemical and biological weapons, Clinton said.

"Governments all over the world today stand united in sharing the conviction that full compliance — and nothing short of full compliance — is needed from Iraq," Clinton added.

A CBS News poll released yesterday showed that a majority of Americans supported the U.S. decision to abort the attack on Iraq. According to the poll, 54 percent of the American public agreed with the decision to hold back on a strike, but 39 percent felt the United States should have taken action.

Satellites may be at risk as Temple-Tuttle nears

By Michael White
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Satellites were being maneuvered yesterday to reduce the possibility of damage as Earth moved through debris in the tail of a comet that was expected to produce the heaviest meteor shower in decades.

The space storm is expected to peak today, exposing the world's 600–plus satellites to possible collisions with speeding particles of grit from comet Temple–Tuttle.

The particles, most no bigger than a grain of sand, can poke holes in solar panels, pit lenses, blast away mirror coatings or cause damaging electromagnetic pulses.

While private and government satellite operators took precautions to reduce exposure during the 10–hour Leonid meteor storm, the odds were against any satellites actually being damaged, experts said.

"The chances of any one satellite getting smacked by a particle is probably less than one in one thousand, but on the other hand, some of these satellites are worth hundreds of millions of dollars, so you do take whatever precautions you can," said Don Yeomans, a senior research scientist at NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory in Pasadena, Calif.

Greenwich, Conn.–based PanAmSat, which operates a network of 18 satellites, put the odds at one in 20,000.

"We fully expect that the meteor storm will be a non–event," said Dan Marcus, a spokesman for PanAmSat, whose fleet serves The Walt Disney Co., Time–Warner, the BBC, long–distance telephone companies MCI and Sprint, and other big corporate customers. Even so, PanAmSat put additional personnel on duty at its Long Beach, Calif., operations center, which monitors company satellites plus three others it manages for DirecTV, Hughes Electronics' satellite–to–home TV business.

Government agencies took similar measures. The Hubble telescope was being turned away from the storm to protect lens surfaces. And the crew of the Russia's Mir space station was to wait out the worst of the storm in their emergency escape vehicle.

Temple–Tuttle passes near the Earth every year, but the resulting meteor shower intensifies every 33 years. First reported by Chinese astronomers in 902, the storms are known as Leonid showers because they appear to come from the constellation Leo. In 1966, when there were fewer than 100 satellites in orbit, the comet produced showers of 144,000 meteors per hour, but the show resulted in no major damage. This time, the shower was expected to range from 5,000 to 100,000 meteors per hour.

Although tiny, the particles move at more than 155,000 mph. Even a small grain can have great destructive force. The impact of a particle also creates an electrical discharge that could cause a satellite to short out.

U.S. works on anti–Iraqi groups

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Clinton administration pledged yesterday to intensify its work with Iraqi opposition groups and also to explore other options to accomplish President Clinton's goal of a new government in Baghdad.

"We're not going to lose any sleep if Saddam Hussein suddenly isn't their leader, from whatever reason," said State Department spokesman James P. Rubin. "No tears will be shed."

In pursuing an overthrow strategy — which Clinton telegraphed in remarks Sunday — the administration is embracing a course of action long advocated by congressional Republicans but first scorned by administration officials and the Pentagon.

"What we're going to try to do is engage more deeply with opposition groups, work with the Congress on some of the ideas that they've had and try to step up our activity with them," Rubin told reporters at the State Department.

Administration officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the London-based Iraqi National Congress, an umbrella group for anti-Saddam factions, and two Kurdish groups in northern Iraq were the first organizations the government planned to work with. Congress, as it raced last month to leave town for the November elections, passed what it called the "Iraq Liberation Act of 1998."

Sponsored by Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., and House International Relations Committee Chairman Benjamin Gilman, R-N.Y., the legislation states as U.S. policy the removal of Saddam's government and authorizes a first installment of up to $97 million in overt military aid to opposition groups.

The administration had expressed skepticism toward the bill. As recently as last month, Marine Corps Gen. Anthony Zinni, head of the U.S. Central Command, told some defense reporters he doubted that any of the opposition groups could solidify opposition enough to remove Saddam from power and then succeed in running the government.

"The danger here is, I don't see a lot of viability in the opposition groups," said Zinni, whose area of responsibility includes much of the Middle East. "I don't think these things have been thought out."

But Clinton signed the bill. And on Sunday, a day after he called off a massive bombing attack on Iraq, the president called explicitly for a "new government" in Baghdad and pledged to carry out the GOP-sponsored plan to try to destabilize Saddam's government.

Richard Murphy, assistant secretary of state for Near East and South Asian relations during the Reagan administration and former ambassador to Syria and Saudi Arabia, said yesterday he was surprised to hear Clinton emphasize the opposition-group plan in his Sunday statement.

"Congress has encouraged this, but appropriated only a token amount, $97 million," he said.

Murphy said both proponents and skeptics agree such a plan has a long time frame. But any attempt by the United States to short-circuit the process and overthrow Saddam by force "would require a major support base in the neighborhood, which seems unlikely."

Meanwhile, Martin Indyk, assistant secretary of state for near eastern affairs, conceded working with opposition groups was not a short-term project. "It will take time and hard work," he told a news conference. "A lot more will be done behind the scenes than will be noticeable publicly, at least at first."

During House debate on the measure, Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana, the senior Democrat on the House International Relations Committee, voiced reservations over the approach, citing the difficulty of unifying Iraqi opposition. He cited as many as 70 rebel and opposition groups.

The House approved the measure Oct. 5 by a 360-38 vote; the Senate shouted its approval by voice vote a few days later. Hamilton, who is retiring, said he still considers the plan fraught with problems. But, he said in an interview, "The frustration level with Saddam Hussein is very high. Everybody wants to get rid of him."

He suggested the opposition-support plan may be more important for its political symbolism — since actually getting rid of Saddam would require a U.S. commitment of ground forces "that most people would back away from. I know I would."

At the State Department, Rubin was asked how the administration planned to bring about a post-Saddam regime.

"We're not promising to bring it about," he said. "What we're saying is we're going to intensify our work. Right now, we're focused on providing political support for the opposition and Congress has given us the authority and funding to arm the opposition."

"We don't want any ill-prepared efforts to lead to a tragic or unnecessary loss of life," Rubin added. "So what we're going to try to do is engage more deeply with opposition groups, work with the Congress on some of the ideas that they've had and try to step up our activity with them."

New drug mixture lends possibilities to kill AIDS; studies still in progress

By Joseph B. Verrengia
Associated Press

Federal researchers have used a new approach to rinse the AIDS virus from one of its most stubborn cellular hiding places in a few patients.

However, it is too early to tell whether the virus still lurks in other parts of the body, and whether the highly experimental treatment might ever be useful, said Dr. Anthony Fauci and other researchers at the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases.

Fauci's team added interleukin-2, an immune system stimulant, to the cocktail of powerful HIV drugs that have been effective in killing large volumes of the virus in AIDS patients.

The new combination appears to have removed HIV below detectable levels in a specific type of immune cell circulating in the blood of three of the 26 patients in the study.

In one patient, there was no trace of the virus in the lymph nodes, the researchers said.

Fauci said it will take years of follow-up studies to determine if the treatment works. And the approach could prove to have toxic side effects, or the virus could develop resistance to the treatment.

Copies of the virus still might be lurking in parts of the body where drugs have difficulty penetrating, including the brain and the retina, as well as other immune cells. And the virus might come roaring back if the antiviral therapy is stopped.

The findings were discussed Sunday in Denver at the annual meeting of the Infectious Diseases Society of America.

Fauci and his team launched the experimental treatment last February.

The treatment targets CD4T cells, which function as the immune system's memory and are found throughout the body. They appear to hang onto the blueprint of bacteria and viruses for years so the body will recognize the infection and mount a defense if it appears again.

In the case of AIDS, the genetic coding of the virus takes up residence in the genes of the CD4T cells. This protects the virus from drugs.

When the body's immune system is activated to fight an infection — or when drug treatment fails — these cells turn on and produce HIV again.

In the study, 26 men with extremely low HIV counts were given a combination of three anti-HIV drugs. Fourteen of the men also were given interleukin-2.

Interleukin-2 is a protein produced by the immune system. It alerts several types of disease-fighting cells to begin reproducing and fighting an invading infection.

Researchers believed that the protein would activate dormant, infected CD4T cells in the bloodstream. This would expose them to the antiviral drugs, killing the CD4T cells and the virus they carried.

The treatment lasted for several weeks. Researchers said it did not work consistently in all of the 14 men.

In six of the men, traces of HIV could not be detected in up to 20 million copies of the CD4T cells. In three of the six, no HIV was found in 300 million immune cells. In one patient, HIV traces could not be detected in a biopsy of his lymph node tissue, either. In contrast, the 12 men who did not receive interleukin-2 had HIV-infected CD4T cells in their blood at the end of the study. "Interleukin-2 might have a role in reducing this reservoir of virus, where HIV would otherwise remain sequestered," Fauci said. Other researchers said the new method could represent the final big research effort to flush HIV from the systems of AIDS patients who have used AIDS drug cocktails to dramatically reduce the amount of virus in their bodies.

One hurdle is systematically eliminating all of HIV's hiding places, a task that might require more time and additional drugs. Another question is whether new immune cells can be infected by the virus as it is flushed out of its hiding places — in effect, whether the aggressive treatment might inadvertently continue the disease cycle.

"In some patients, you might eradicate the virus," said Dr. Roger Pomerantz of Thomas Jefferson University in Philadelphia. "In others, the virus may be activated and infect new cells."

Questions over McDougal's shopping on trial

By Linda Deutsch
Associated Press

SANTA MONICA, Calif. — Before going on trial on embezzlement charges, Susan McDougal claimed the case was an attempt to coerce her to cooperate with Kenneth Starr's Whitewater investigation. But ultimately, she adopted the shop-till-you drop defense.

Ms. McDougal is charged with embezzling $50,000 from conductor Zubin Mehta and his wife, Nancy, while serving as Mrs. Mehta's bookkeeper and personal assistant from 1989 to 1992.

During closing arguments yesterday, however, Ms. McDougal's lawyer said that Mrs. Mehta shopped with abandon, lavished expensive gifts on Mrs. McDougal and allowed Ms. McDougal liberal use of her credit cards, then turned on her assistant and accused her of embezzling. The jury was shown receipts that Mrs. Mehta signed for $30,000 worth of goods on a credit card she claimed she didn't know existed.

"She says she didn't shop?" said defense attorney Mark Geragos. "I expected the next witness to say the world is flat." The jury could begin deliberations as soon as today. Ms. McDougal could get four years in prison if convicted.

Geragos, who often argued outside the jury's presence that the case was an offshoot of Whitewater, didn't mention the land deal or Ms. McDougal's ties to it. Superior Court Judge Leslie Light had declared last week, "I don't want to hear any more about Whitewater."

Whitewater remained an undercurrent at the courthouse nonetheless.

Actor Ed Asner, a liberal activist, showed up for the closing arguments and gave the defendant a hug.

"It's a continuation of the Ken Starr saga," Asner said. He added, "She has shown tremendous courage, veracity and honesty. She did not knuckle under."

The charges are unrelated to issues in the Whitewater investigation of President Clinton, Ms. McDougal and her late ex-husband, James McDougal. Ms. McDougal spent 18 months in jail for refusing to testify before a Whitewater grand jury.

She also served 3 1/2 months of a two-year sentence in a Whitewater-related loan fraud case. Also convicted were her ex-husband and former Arkansas Gov. Jim Guy Tucker. Ms. McDougal was freed from prison earlier this year because of a painful back ailment.

During testimony, Ms. McDougal said she came under the sway of Mrs. Mehta, a compulsive shopper who raced through department stores buying so fast that she needed her assistant to sign the credit cards.

She said Mrs. Mehta also scolded her when she refused to accept gifts of clothing and other luxuries during their shopping expeditions, telling Ms. McDougal she was taking the joy out of shopping.

During closing arguments last week, prosecutor Jeffrey Somow portrayed Ms. McDougal as a greedy thief who exploited her employer. For her part, Mrs. Mehta said that she bought only necessities and never authorized her assistant to sign for her. Geragos, however, spoke of two close friends who kept track of their obligations with little notes to each other.

"Part of this great embezzlement scheme is that you borrow money and pay it back?" Geragos asked. "There is no embezzlement. There was nothing nefarious about it."

Bosnian Serbs convicted by United Nations judges

By Mike Corder
Associated Press

THE HAGUE, Netherlands — U.N. judges yesterday handed down the first international convictions for atrocities committed against Bosnian Serbs during the Bosnian civil war, including the panel's first guilty verdict for rape.

A three-judge panel at the Yugoslav war crimes tribunal convicted a Bosnian Croat and two Muslims for murdering and torturing, as well as raping, Serb prisoners at the Celebici camp in central Bosnia in 1992.

But they acquitted Zejnil Delalic, a Muslim military commander accused of having overall control of the camp, saying there was not enough evidence to link him to atrocities.

The guilty verdicts were the first by an international court since post-World War II tribunals in Tokyo and Nuremberg, Germany, to hold superiors responsible for the crimes of their subordinates. The 20-month trial also broke new ground of another kind: It was the first to focus on atrocities against Serbs, who are blamed for the majority of war crimes carried out during the 3 1/2-year Bosnian conflict.

"We have been appalled by the details of your criminal actions," Presiding Judge Adolphus Karibi-Whyte of Nigeria told the Celebici camp's deputy commander, Hazim Delic, a Muslim sentenced to 20 years in prison for the rape, murder and torture of prisoners.

"You displayed a singular brutality in causing the deaths of two men...and a calculating cruelty in the torture and mistreatment of many others," Karibi-Whyte said.

Chewing gum given to him by a U.N. guard, Delic showed no emotion when he heard the verdicts. In their 483-page ruling, the judges said Delic appeared "to take a sadistic pleasure in causing the detainees pain."

The camp's warden, Bosnian Croat Zdravko Mucic, was found guilty of 11 war crimes and grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions for overseeing guards who killed nine Serbs and tortured six. The fact his subordinates carried out the crimes did not spare him responsibility for their actions, the court said.

Mucic, wearing dark sunglasses and a cross on a chain around his neck, smiled as he heard his sentence of seven years imprisonment. Deputy Prosecutor Graham Blewitt said he was considering appealing the "inadequate" sentence.

A camp guard, Esad Landzo, was ordered jailed for 15 years for murdering three inmates and torturing others.

Prosecutors said Landzo and Delic beat to death one man and nailed the badge of a Muslim political party to the victim's head. They said Landzo also beat a 60-year-old man to death with a wooden plank.

Although they were convicted, Mucic, Delic and Landzo also were acquitted of 34 charges, including several counts of murder and torture. All four had faced up to life imprisonment.

Mucic, Delic and Landzo will likely serve their sentences in prison in either Italy, Norway or Finland, countries which have agreed to house war criminals convicted by the tribunal.

NBA lockout

You know what? I don't even care if there is an NBA season anymore. It is the middle of November, and there has not even been a single trace of any sign of progress between the players and the owner and, once again, professional sports is stuck in a situation that has become all too familiar in recent years.

By now it has become a cliché that everyone is extremely sick of hearing, but I'll repeat it anyway: "The players' salaries are way too high!" That does not just go for pro-hoops either. Last week, Mike Piazza signed a contract worth 91 million dollars, over seven years, to remain the starting catcher for the New York Mets. The contract makes Piazza the highest paid player in baseball history. In a related story, there was a report that some major turning was going on in Babe Ruth's grave. I saw an interview on BET with Tim Hardaway, and he said the reason the salaries are so high is "because they should be getting a fair share of the profits that the owners are bringing in, and when compared to that number the players are being paid in pocket change." Well, if that is so, I wonder if Michael Jordan would mind if I borrowed one of his quarters valued at 25 million dollars a year.

> "The cost of going to a pro–sporting event has become so high that it is too expensive for an average family to go out and support a local team."
> Ryan Benharris

The majority of players have no love of the game, they just have a love of the green. I'm pretty sure that Wade Boggs is the most selfish player ever to play a professional sport. When asked if he was going to hang up his shoes this year, Boggs replied, "How can I retire, I haven't gotten 3,000 hits yet?" It is clear to see that the reason why he went to an expansion team last year is so he will pretty much be guaranteed to play everyday, regardless of whether it helps the team or not. He really does not care about winning a World Series, because he has already used the Yankees for that.

It is not just the players' fault though. At least the players have some shred of respect for the fans, and some of them actually know what it is like to be a person. The owners are signing contracts with television and radio stations worth billions of dollars, and are guaranteed to see that money no matter how the season turns out. For instance, the NBA signed a contract worth just under 2 billion dollars with Turner Broadcasting to show many more pre-season, regular season and post-season games than they have ever showed before, and there is a clause in the contract that says only one of Turner's cable stations has to show only one game this season, and the NBA gets all of the money in the entire contract. So, what it really comes down to is that if it looks like there is not going to be an NBA season, the owners will just organize some sort of a publicity stunt, maybe an old-timers game, show it on TNT, and watch the cash start rolling in. To me, that is even more disgusting than the players' salaries. What makes it even worse is that when the owners confront the fans, they do not acknowledge these TV contracts and claim they absolutely have to raise ticket prices, simply to pay the athletes' enormous salaries. When you think about it, it all pretty much routes back to fact that everyone knows the way to get the most money they can possibly steal from the public, and not only are they going to do it, but they will cover it up by lying at the same time.

The cost of going to a pro-sporting event has become so high that it is too expensive for an average family to go out and support a local team. I remember when I was young, getting really excited about going to Fenway or the Garden because I'd get to watch my favorite team play, while my dad bought my brother and me lots of food and usually some sort of souvenir to bring home. If I was five years old today, a trip to Fenway Park for my father, brother and I could end up costing almost $100. A trip to the Fleet Center could cost almost $200, and if you want to see the Patriots, you pretty much need to find a scalper, (or now they call themselves "ticket agencies") and one ticket could be as much as a an entire day for three people at the Fleet Center.

It has become so ridiculous that I really don't care if there is an NBA season this year. It really wouldn't phase me that much if MLB, NHL and NFL all decided to stop playing as well. I still would not watch pro-soccer! The situation is so bad that too many fans are not only losing interest, but they have stopped caring as well. You know what Dad, don't take me out to the ball game, I'll just sit home and watch The Simpsons.

Down at the porno shack

Driving home from the mall Saturday, I happened to notice a tow truck making its way into the parking lot of the porno shack on Route 9.

Now granted, I was coming home from the mall (Hot Topic was having one heck of a sale), so I am not without sin myself. But, I felt so bad for the guy whose car had broken down — a level of empathy I was not accustomed to. Maybe it was the fact that it was my future place of employment.

The poor guy came out of the nameless store, maybe with some purchases, maybe without. He goes to the car, starts it up — no luck. "Come on, baby," he says gently to the car, stroking the dashboard. "Do it for me, baby. Do it for me." "That guy needs a girlfriend," exiting customers comment.

Mike Messaros

Now what does one do? Do you wait, hoping, naively, that the car "fixes itself," or do you just give in to the inevitable and call the tow truck.

So you have a decision to make, but have no idea how to go about it. Some people would ask, as now seems to be in fashion, "What Would Jesus Do?" Not me — I find that question silly and ridiculously unfair. I mean, Jesus turned water into wine and walked on water. I get winded climbing up the stairs. If Jesus drops grape juice on the carpet, he's zapping it out; I'm reaching for the wet/dry vac. And "What Would Jesus Do?" just doesn't seem to work when applied to a broken down car in front of the porno shack.

So the call is placed, and you stammer through the information, avoiding the fact that, yes, you are at the porno shack. Then the question: "Where is your exact location, sir?"

"I... I don't know the exact address, but it's on Route 9."

"Route 9 is pretty big, sir. Can you be more specific."

"There's a gas station across the street."

"Sir, you have to be more specific. We can't come out unless..."

"Well, I'm at the porno shack," our hero mumbles.

"I didn't catch that, sir. You'll have to speak up."

"It's... ahem... the porno shack"

"And the exact location?"

"I told you! I don't know the exact address! It's the porno shack, on Route 9... ring any bells?"

"No, sir. I am not a purveyor of pornography. I think it cheapens love and demeans women."

"Oh, yeah, so do I... I was just, uh, at the Asian–American food market next door, picking up some, uh... bean dip."

"Oh, come off it sir."

Because if there is one thing you can not do, it is sit outside of the porno shack and say to random passers–by "I need a jump." It is just not kosher.

So you end up having to call the "wrecker," as I guess they call their tow trucks up here, colloquially. To me, that is like calling the hospital "ye olde dying house" or the porno shack "church." I had a bit of trouble on the Massachusetts Turnpike after I put too much oil in the ol' Honda Civic (or "the chick magnet"), and when the good ol' helper squad (or whatever it is called) showed up, the guy offered to call "the wrecker." Even after three years in the state, this was new to me, and I was left speechless. "Yup," the guys said, hitching up his pants, "the wrecker could be here in a jiffy."

I had an image in my head of "the wrecker" — some huge motorized beast, like Truck–a–saurus at the monster truck shows, bearing down the turnpike, picking my poor little Honda up in its hydraulic claws, blowing flames all over it and then chomping down on the car. "Roar," cries the wrecker, as it lamely bites and lambastes my car. "That baby's got an appetite," the help squad guy says. "Poor, poor out–of–state bastard," the passing 'Chusetters would say, shaking their heads. "Let's go get a frappe."

> "Please, don't call the wrecker," I pleaded, "I'll do anything. Do you want money? The guy shook his head: "Take off the skirt, junior."

"Please, don't call the wrecker," I pleaded, "I'll do anything. Do you want money? Please, don't call the wrecker." The guy shook his head. "Take off the skirt, junior."

And while I'm digressing, what is with all that chalk graffiti centering around the library that seems to have been written by some rogue Mount Holyoke College rabble– rousers? If those kids want a war, they've got a war. I've had it up to here with their "prettiest campus in the world," teaching school ways. Emily Dickinson didn't even like the place. I just had to get that out. It is all that talk about "the wrecker."

Anyhoo, back to the porno shack. The fact that you're getting towed from the porno shack makes the whole situation that much worse. I've had to get my car towed from in front of my house, and that was embarrassing. Simple conversation between driver and towee gets clouded in subtext, as you filter every word you say through a self– censor trying not to say anything that could be a double entendre. "At least I wasn't rear–ended," you laugh, before realizing, "I should just shut up." Plus, you are worrying the sweaty cashier is going to burst out at any moment to exclaim, "Dude, lucky you're still here. I checked the back and we do have another copy of 'Monkey Love!'"

I know I couldn't handle it, and my heart goes out to the poor soul whose car broke down while he was shopping for... Asian–American delicacies. I couldn't have played it cool. Because as much as I say "'Cool' is my middle name" or "'Lambada' is my middle name," it's all a lie. It's just "Francis."

Needle exchange defeated

Five years from now, you get a call from your brother. He tells you he has tested HIV-positive and believes he contracted it from a reformed IV–drug user with whom he had a relationship. They had dated for six months, but parted when she relapsed. He tells you he is very worried about the partners he has had since her, in spite of his use of protection during sex.

He is a citizen of Springfield, where voters this election rejected a needle–exchange program, by a 3–2 margin, in favor of an undefined, status quo approach to stopping IV– drug–spread HIV. With the coverage the issue received in local papers and on TV stations, voters faced one of the most controversial questions in the city's recent memory.

> "It seems that CANE and its supporters believe it is more important to enforce laws and morals than it is to stop the spread of HIV."
> Jason Wiesenbach

The question only came to the ballot after city councilors voted 5–4 in favor of the program, which allows users to swap used needles for clean ones, provided they sign up for treatment. The clean ones, of course, do not contain HIV or any other disease, which presumably slows the spread of AIDS.

In response to the councilors' vote, an anti–program group formed, called Citizens Against Needle Exchange (CANE). CANE helped gather enough signatures for a ballot referendum question aimed at overturning the 5–4 vote. CANE members favor an increased "tough love" approach combined with stepped–up treatment programs to curb drug use, which presumably would slow the spread of HIV.

CANE believes that needle–exchange endorses IV–drug use and that clean needles will not decrease drug use. This likely is true, but the exchange program was not primarily aimed at slowing drug use, but the spread of HIV. By being victorious, then, what has CANE really changed in Springfield?

Their treatment program is simply a extension of current publicly funded programs, which nearly everyone in the country uses. These often treat drug use like a sickness, where drug use is the cause of problems for the addict, not the effect of problems in the user's life. Like most current public treatments, CANE advocates an individualistic way of stopping a user's addiction. One CANE supporter, who wrote to Springfield's Union–News on Nov. 13, referring to "when drug abusers choose to clean up their lives," reminds us that treatments put the responsibility on the addict, not the society.

Therefore, while CANE campaigned for stronger treatment programs, it really has supported the status quo, in which the city will use approximately the same programs it has now. The exchange program, however, would have at least cut down on the spread of HIV, even if its treatment programs were of the current public treatment type too.

It seems that CANE and its supporters, and obviously Springfield, believe it is more important to enforce laws and morals than it is to stop the spread of HIV, which is a threat to humanity's survival. Moreover, CANE has ignored the big picture since IV drug users do not stay exclusively within a circle of other IV drug users. As my example at the beginning suggests, dating anyone who has used IV drugs puts one at risk for infection. While protection during sex may prevent most HIV transfers, protection will fail eventually, and only one time is necessary. However, with needle–exchange in place, some of the infections would be prevented, and the spread of HIV can only decrease, even if it is only a little.

Needle–exchange certainly is not a solution, though. The program's secondary, and underlying, cause is to treat drug users, or decrease the number of addicts. But current programs have not cut the number of addicts, nor have the number of new addicts decreased. Elliott Currie's Reckoning supports this assertion with concrete studies.

To help addicts get off drugs, we need environments they can return to after treatment that do not subject them to the pains that originally drove them to addiction. If nothing in a reformed addict's life changes but the lack of drug use, the person has little choice but to fill the psychological void with something again, and likely this will be drugs.

Obviously, if we cut IV drug addiction, we cut new HIV cases. However, this will not occur unless we stop new addiction cases, most of which stem from societal pressures. Instead, with a change from a poor environment to a supportive one during the treatment program, addicts recover quickly. Private programs, which sometimes use the same ideas as public ones, support this because well–off citizens return to a supportive environment that is in no way like that of endemic poverty. This suggests that improving society, such as by eliminating poverty, we will curb drug addiction, and consequently new HIV cases.

Invoking needle–exchange does not hurt anyone. No laws are imposed on citizens that affect their personal freedoms. However, it does not help society, except to slow HIV transfer. The fact that public treatment programs often end in relapse is not a call to increase them or strengthen them, since they do not address the causes of addiction — the problems in an addict's life. To stop HIV transfer and IV– drug addiction, we should address society's problems, the root of most addictions. Addiction is an effect of this, not a cause. That HIV infection your brother or anyone tells you he has five years from now is still preventable today.

Buffalo Tom did not forget the rock last Thursday at the Avalon in Boston.

By Mike Messaros
Collegian Staff

BUFFALO TOM
Avalon Ballroom
Nov. 12

BOSTON — Sometimes, the band forgets to bring the rock. They leave it at home like a set of car keys: "Dang, I had it in my pocket, but I forgot it when I changed my pants." The band then proceeds to slog through their set, like a nine to five job.

Buffalo Tom's lead singer Bill Janovitz reminded us about five songs into their buoyant set on Thursday night that they definitely brought the rock. Sucking blood from a small cut on his hand, he joked, "I bleed for you," holding out the injured finger. Relying not so much on spectacle as on pure energy, the hometown heroes blew through an 18-song set, hardly taking time to catch their breath or allow the audience to catch theirs.

I have never seen so much spit as I did when the band played "Sodajerk," a bouncy song that is bled anonymously into the TV nation's conscience by being used in two commercials (most recently for some car company). Wrapping himself around the microphone, Janowitz was an example of tightly wound energy, spitting out each and every word and sending a spray of spit into the spotlights. Bassist Chris Colbourn played the calm part, taking over on vocals for "Rachel" and "Kitchen Door" and lending expert backing vocals on songs like "Postcard."

During the second song, "Summer," Janovitz made reference to the Mo Vaughn situation. "Who do we blame?" he asked, "don't blame Mo," drawing a huge response from the audience. The comment was a perfect lead–in to a song about summers long gone and irretrievable: "Where have heroes gone today?/ Mick and Keith and Willie Mays."

The band reached deep in their catalogue for the set, going back to their second album to play "Birdbrain." They drew heavily from their classic Let Me Come Over, leading off the set with the rocking "Velvet Roof," and closing the night with a gentle, fragile "Frozen Lake." "Taillights Fade" provided one of the high points of the evening, with people letting out a gasp of recognition at the fan favorite, and then singing along.

Song selection leaned toward the faster songs, but the slow, romantic songs the band is known for were not forgotten, interspersed between the more upbeat ones.

O'Barr and others honor Eisner

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

James O'Barr had no formal art training when he began his career as a graphic novelist. The man who would later write The Crow, a landmark piece of work that defined gothic comics for years to come, was forced to practice his pride and joy with a 72–color art set bought from K–Mart for $1.98 before propelling himself into underground immortality.

O'Barr, years after climbing out of his personal hole, came to the University of Massachusetts to share his struggles with students and area fans. In his prologue to "The Graphic Novel: A 20th anniversary conference on an emerging literary and artistic medium" last Thursday, O'Barr tells listeners, "You only get better. You can't get worse."

The conference was a celebration of the 20th anniversary of the publication of A Contract with God, the legendary Will Eisner's first work, considered by many to be the first graphic novel, and was put on by the UMass departments of comparative literature, English, art history, art, and Judaic and Near Eastern Studies, along with the Words and Pictures Museum, the National Yiddish Book Center, and the UMass Science Fiction society.

The conference was organized by N.C. Christopher Couch, the senior editor of the Kitchen Sink Press and a lecturer in the comparative literature department, and assistant coordinator Brendan Mahan, an intern at the Kitchen Sink Press and a BDIC creative writing major at UMass.

The weekend–long event included seminars and speeches on the marketing of graphic novels, graphic novels as adaptations of novels, and the early development of the graphic novel. The event climaxed at the keynote speech given by Will Eisner.

"For me it is no small thing to witness the 20th anniversary of this, my first graphic novel," Eisner said. "The miracle of being 'in–print' so long is awesome.

"I...hoped that [A Contract with God] would achieve a place on the shelf alongside other 'regular' books in an adult's library. To my surprise, it eventually happened and the fact that it retains enough marketability to make it worthwhile for publishers to reprint it is a miracle."

Mahan, who was pleased with the results of the conference overall, wished that more "Minutemen" were able to enjoy the event, which boasted appearances by many big names in the graphic novel circle including Howard Cruse, author of Stuck Rubber Baby.

"It went really well; I would guess somewhere around 100 people came — 170 if you combine the weekend with the O'Barr speech," Mahan said. "I was kind of disappointed that there weren't more students there. We were hoping to get more students involved.

"When I talked to Will Eisner after the event, he felt that it went over really well, and that it was a worthwhile experience. One of the best things about the conference was that even though it was a literary conference for scholars in the field, we did get to have a student panel."

The student panel was the brainchild of Mahan, and consisted of himself, Julia Swanson, Jason Czernich, and Kevin Doherty. The panel helped organize the event.

In its entirety, "The Graphic Novel: A 20th anniversary conference on an emerging literary and artistic medium" helped bridge the gap between the artistic elite of the graphic novel industry and the fans and supporters of the Pioneer Valley.

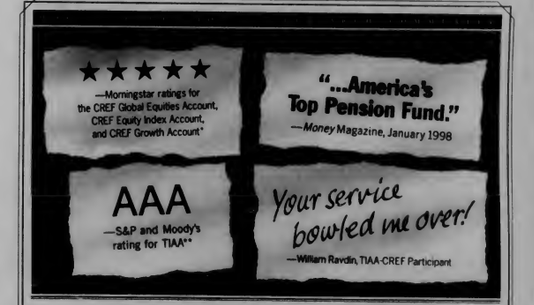
Rap music's latest comedy of errors

I was watching BET's Rap City the other day when I had an obvious revelation. Rap music is not only a lucrative business, it is also a hilarious comedy. I got to thinking, who are all these cats and how do they sell records? Then it hit me. West of Pennsylvania, the "east coast" is a fairly small demographic. And the plain–clothed, subdued styles associated with organic hip–hop have been primarily replaced by glitter, glory and gold. Virtual armies like that of No Limit and Ca$h Money Records have risen like the alien spaceship at the end of the X–Files movie. So for once, when the brand spanking new Ghetto Commission video came on, I was tempted to pick up the channel changer and raise the volume. After polishing off the Corona I had been swigging, I found myself laughing hysterically watching these constipated rappers spit their dirty Southern rants. Quite honestly, that new Mystikal video scares me. Or check out that "Major Players" video with Silk. Mama Mia and Master P himself, as they capture the Bayou playa mentality. The chorus is a thought–provoking concept: "If it don't fold/If it don't ching, ching/then you ain't a real soldier..."

Or how about this Juvenile kid? Uhhhh! I thought rappers had to at least implore lyrics that rhyme. Come on, even Com'ron can do that. What is ironic is that Juvenile, who is on Ca$h Money, probably went platinum in Baton Rouge alone after receiving 4 mics in the Source.

Much to my chagrin, I cracked another Corona and forced myself to keep watching. I saw an array of amusing videos from Mean Green, Black Mafia, Crucial Conflict and Twista and the Speednotmobsta. While these acts are a seemingly ridiculous mockery of hip–hop, they are also receiving critical acclaim.



So, perhaps my vision is too narrow? For further discussion, check out "5–Piece Chicken Dinner" Monday nights on WMUA. Although it is not a vocal exhibition, many dub artists and instrumental DJs are providing alternatives to the hip–hop you find on Rap City. If you are a purest for live DJ's and hot beats, tune in to 91.1 on Wednesday nights for three hours of "Turntable Swestshop." And if that is still not enough, check out Big Ant on Tuesday nights for "Tha Hit List."

Despite the comical aspects of today's most popular rap music, there is a growing civilization of hip–hop right here in the Pioneer Valley. With a little networking and some constant collaboration, we stand to make some noise and create a legitimate market for the organic music we crave. In the coming weeks look out for several events that will incite you to shut off BET and get involved in the community. Stay tuned...

Cleo introduces their Sister

Letters to Cleo finally chose to re-release the rare Sister album on CD.

SISTER
Letters to Cleo
Wicked Disc

This is not a new Letters to Cleo album. Actually, it is quite old. Most of the material from Sister predates even the band as we know it. So, what is the story behind Sister?

"We've been asked over the last couple of years about these elusive tapes," says guitarist Greg McKenna. "Now seemed to be the time to do it, we didn't have to worry about complications with a label." So here it is, dug up, dusted off, re-touched and re-packaged. Available only on cassette until now, Sister contains the original songs recorded by Letters to Cleo — when the only current members of the band were lead vocalist Kay Hanley and McKenna. For many Sister is the missing piece of a puzzle. The final "fill-in-the-blank" for tracing LTC's progression from the original Cherry Disc pressing of Aurora Gory Alice to the level of maturity the band has reached with their latest LP, Go!

It is near impossible to find an original copy of Sister, since very few were made. The most remote, hole-in-the- wall record stores in Boston don't even have it. If you already have a copy, it's probably a fourth-generation dub that sounds inferior to even the most dilapidated vinyl in existence.

The CD, to be available starting today, is mastered, a luxury that the original could not afford and contains all the songs on the cassette release, such as "Sister," "Pete Beat" and "He's Stayin'." The silver disc contains some other surprises as well, for instance LTC's cover of Scruffy the Cat's "You Dirty Rat" (with Charlie Chesterman on vocals), previously available on the UK version of the "Here and Now" single and the Safe and Sound benefit album. "Green Eggs," the first song recorded with the band as they appeared on AGA, and "Secret Agent" among others. The last half of the album are among the first songs recorded with guitarist Michael Eisenstien, bassist Scott Reibling, and former drummer Stacy Jones.

The first seven songs on the disc (which made up all of the original release) show all the signs of a promising pop band. The version of "I See" on Sister may not exactly be worlds apart from the version on Aurora Gory Alice, but it displays a logical progression that would eventually lead up to the pop brilliance of Go!

The dropping of their previous label, Revolution, left the Cleos with little restrictions regarding the re-release of Sister. Available on Newbury Comics' label, Wicked Disc, the album is an important part of the band's past that is now readily available to fans at all Newbury Comics locations and via Letters to Cleo's website: www.letterstocleo.com.

Aside from the release of Sister, the band is keeping busy. Hanley is in the process of writing a new album, and Eisenstien, Reibling and Jones are working on Nina Gordon's solo album. A cut for the Pixies tribute album is planned also. Jones, who left the band in 1996 to join Veruca Salt, has played with LTC on the Go! tour last year after the dismissal of Tom Polce, but has not rejoined the band, according to McKenna. "We're just friends now...He's playing guitar for his own band, BMX Girl...but we're not looking for a new drummer yet, just the four of us makes taking photos easier." A–

Skins more than the surface

SKINning the SurFACE
Bowker Auditorium
Nov. 13

In Bowker Auditorium last Friday night, the audience was advised to "place their seat in the upright position and prepare for takeoff" before the beginning of SKINning the SurFACE, the latest work present by the University of Massachusetts New WORLD Theater.

This advice was unnecessary because the audience was glued to their seats by In Mixed Company, the New York- based dance group that created and performed the piece.

SKINning the SurFACE is a spoken word and dance piece that explores and exposes the injustices suffered by children born to American troops and Vietnamese women during the Vietnam War. It deals specifically with the "mixed race" children's treatment in the war's aftermath and the 1987 Amerasian Homecoming Act that allowed them to enter the United States.

On April 30, 1975, when the last U.S. helicopter left Saigon, over 3,000 Americans were left behind. Since the children bore the characteristics of their American fathers, their Vietnamese families abandoned them. In Mixed Company uses this piece of history as an example of the social injustices and as a foundation for exploring the problems faced by bi-racial individuals.

SKINning the SurFACE began with a combination of singing and talking in a medley of Vietnamese, French, Mandarin, Japanese, and English. Repetition was a key element in their speech: most of the monologues were comprised of only a single sentence repeated many times. The scene quickly switched to a dance piece, an impressive combination of ballet, acrobatics and some karate movements.

Dance was the constant element of the evening, with each scene containing some dance while the company continued with their storytelling. Most of the dance pieces were not set to music, but to the songs and dialogues of the performers themselves. Each performer demonstrated incredible physical strength and grace, while maintaining concentration on the delivery of their lines.

The script included passages from Michelangelo and William Blake, as well as the novel Vietnamerica by Thomas Bass which examines the experience of Amerasian children.

In addition to dialogue and dance, the piece incorporated other mediums such as radio broadcasts, slide projections and newsreels, at least one of which was running at all times. The newsreel was used more than the other devices and ran for most of the performance. At times the radio broadcasts were distracting from what was happening on stage, but since they were actual broadcasts taken from the time of the Vietnam War, they added to the overall message of the piece.

Smith College alumna Maura Nguyen Donohue both choreographed and performed in the piece along with six other dancers and one musician. Donohue was born in Saigon, raised in Rhode Island and graduated cum laude from Smith College in 1992 with a bachelor of arts degree in Anthropology and Dance. She moved to New York in 1994 and in 1995 founded Maura Nguyen Donohue/In Mixed Company, a performance group that explores different cultural issues and is based in New York City.

In Mixed Company began its residence at UMass' New WORLD Theater on Nov. 1 and will continue here until Nov. 14. It is part of the New WORLD's ongoing project called Viet New: A Generation Emerges. The project was created to provide a voice for young professional Vietnamese–American artists. SKINning the SurFACE is brand new for Maura Nguyen Donohue/In Mixed Company, its production through the New WORLD Theater was the piece's first performance. Unfortunately, last Friday's show at Bowker Auditorium was their only performance at UMass.

"Scottish Windows" and "Postcard," both from the bands new album, Smitten, showed how cathartic their song writing is, as the songs made their way to explosive, emotional climaxes. They began their first encore with "Late at Night," and when the disco ball was turned on, a mood was set that reminded one of one of the better high school dances you went to.

Things got ugly when the band closed out their regular set with "Treehouse" and the audience, consisting of mostly 30- year-olds, started to mosh. How '93. A bunch of 30-year- olds moshing is a pathetic sight, especially with a group of beer mamas and pencil-pushers getting geared up for casual day throwing themselves around the same way they did in that Nirvana video they saw on VH-1 the night before. During the slow songs, some of the more sloshed fans grinded against each other. Hey, there ain't nothing wrong with a little bump 'n' grind — unless you're ugly.

But it was hard to ruin the atmosphere of the night. The band played on, looking quizzically at the crowd surfers (yup — crowd surfers), but continued pounding out song after song of pure pop goodness. When they played "Frozen Lake," in a moment of crystalline and quiet beauty, everything stopped. The audience hung on every word and every note. Tom Maginnis' brushed drum beat providing the perfectly soft accompaniment. The band carried so much power that they could leave on such a subtle note after such a high energy. Even the ugly people weren't disappointed.

The Minutewomen were able to cut the lead to 60-59 on a three pointer from Kelly Van Huisen, who was buried deep in the left corner.

That was as close as UMass would come, as Bouchard continued to lead the surging Eagles. She notched six free throws in the last 1:22. This allowed the junior standout guard to conclude with a team-leading 17 points and seven rebounds.

Van Huisen made a last gasp attempt by nailing an open 18-footer to cut the deficit to 69-66 with 12 seconds to play.

Murphy and Whitney Steele sealed the contest by hitting three of four from the charity stripe to finalize the tally at 72-66.

The bright spots for the Minutewomen included Tez Kraft, who poured in 18 points and grabbed 10 thunderous rebounds, while Van Huisen added 10 points and two assists.

"I was extremely motivated entering this game," Kraft said. "We wanted to prove that we were the best team in Massachusetts."

Foul trouble was a contributing factor to the defeat, as MacFarland bowed out late in the game, and Jaywana Bradley picked up three violations in five minutes of play.

UMass also did not receive much production from its bench on this occasion, as the reserves contributed only four points, led by Tonia Thomas with three.

"Our bench is like this sometimes," O'Brien said. "They struggled tonight, but hopefully we can get solid efforts from them in Hawaii. The important thing is that they learned from this experience."

UMass will depart for the 50th state on Wednesday, where they will face national power Kansas, as well as Hawaii and Minnesota over the weekend.

Men's XC ends season with 16th at regionals
Women's XC places seventh in season–closer

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

After a long season, the Massachusetts men's cross country team ended its year with a 16th place finish at the NCAA Northeast Regional Qualifier this past Saturday.

This test of endurance consisted of 27 teams and 179 athletes from across the region; all of which were competing for the same thing: a secure spot at the NCAA Championships.

Though UMass didn't advance to the finals, they had a respectable finish with 409 points.

Junior Kevin Somers led the men to a 51st overall finish with a time of 33:25.8. Finishing 81st overall was junior Matt Ely (34:00.71). Freshmen Colin Baughman (34:01.4) and Ryan Corbett (34:19.9) had impressive finishes placing 82nd and 95th respectively. Rounding out the top five harriers was senior Dan LeBouef (34:28.0) in 100th place.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Ken O'Brien

Not knowing how his newer athletes could handle the race of over six miles, coach Ken O'Brien was nervous prior to the meet. But after seeing two freshmen place in his top five, O'Brien retracted his prior doubts.

"Inconsistency has plagued us this entire season and I was sure that would be our downfall this weekend. But Baughman and Corbett were determined and trained very hard. They really came through for us," O'Brien said.

Ironically, LeBoeuf placed at the bottom of the top runners; he's been the number two man all season.

"Dan experienced a tendon strain at the top of his arch at A–10s a couple of weeks ago, and wasn't even supposed to compete. He was very determined to give a strong performance for his last meet, and competed despite the pain," explained O'Brien. "He hadn't even run at all since A–10s, so his time this weekend was quite impressive."

Throughout the season, O'Brien has tried to remain realistic about the outcome of every meet. Though he believed his team would place slightly higher than 16th, he was not disappointed at all.

"Like I said before, inconsistency has plagued us all year and our team is relatively young and inexperienced. However, physically, every member of the team has drastically improved. Everyone has been working out hard and are better athletes to show for it. They just need to apply the physical improvement to actual competition in the future. And overall, this is one of the best teams I've ever had the pleasure of coaching," said O'Brien.

Many of the men are involved in track and field, so their athletic year is far from over. The men will take a short break, and then jump back into action in December as they prepare for the indoor track season.

The University of Massachusetts women's cross country team finished its season with a seventh place showing at the NCAA Eastern Regional Qualifier on Saturday.

Held at Van Cortlandt Park in Bronx, N.Y., the race was won by Providence with a total of 70 points. Cornell finished second with 122 points. Both Providence and Cornell earned automatic bids to compete in the NCAA Championships later this month.

With a total of 268 points, UMass was able to finish ahead of rival Vermont, which finished ninth with 283 points, but failed to catch competitor Boston University, which finished sixth, with 167 points.

Rounding out the top five were Boston College, in third place with 131 points and Brown in fourth with 142 points, while Dartmouth compiled 156 points to finish in fifth.

Although Massachusetts finished in the top 10, where coach Julie LaFreniere expected it to, she had mixed feelings about the race.

"I have mixed feelings about the competition. With an optimal performance we probably couldn't have changed our place, but we could have changed the amount of points we earned," LaFreniere said.

Changing the amount of points UMass earned would have been nice, since the team feels they are not 100 points worse than Boston University.

"I didn't like finishing 100 points behind Boston University. However, I did like finishing ahead of Vermont," LaFreniere said.

Freshman Kristen Cisowski led the Minutewomen with a time of 18:25 and an overall finish of 27th. Melissa Henderson finished 46th overall with a time of 18:52. Sally Hirsch was second behind her, good enough for 47th.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Julie LaFreniere

Rounding out the top five for UMass were Sharon Tillotson, with a time of 19:08 and a 65th place finish, and Nicole Way, who finished 88th overall with a time of 19:31.

Although their season is now over, LaFreniere feels this was a great year for her and her team.

"Overall, the season was good. We overcame many illnesses and got our health back for the last two events. It takes a lot of courage to train the way these women did. It showed up in the end," LaFreniere said.

Not only are they hardworking women, they are also a lot of fun to coach, according to LaFreniere.

"This is a great group of kids. We were very successful and had a lot of fun doing it," LaFreniere said.

Gymnastics set to begin seasons

As the snow and ice season approaches, so does the men's and women's gymnastics teams seasons. The teams are very determined to take the gold this year, as they both have talented new freshmen and more experienced veterans from last season.

The women's team, however, is already planning for the future, as they have signed three athletes for next year.

Megan Donoghue from Tewksbury was the Massachusetts state all-around champion in 1997, and is a six-time Junior Olympic National Qualifier. Jen Gendron of Shrewsbury was the 1998 AA champion, and captured first-place spots in the floor exercise and vault at the Nations Capital Cup this year. Finally, Katie Teft of Grand Rapids, Mich. finished ninth at the 1996 Olympic trials, and was named one of the alternates for the 1996 team in Atlanta.

The women's team has its first meet over intersession and the men's first competition is an intrasquad meet this Thursday at 7 p.m. at the Boyden Gymnastics center. This meet gives coach Roy Johnson a better idea of who will compete in the UMass Open and subsequent meets of the season.

UMass men and women swim to wins in separate Boston meets last weekend

By Jimmy Chen
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts's men's and women's swimming teams remained undefeated after last weekend's meets in Boston. The Minutemen (3–0 overall) walked away with a victory from Boston University (166–129) on Sunday, while the Minutewomen (4–0 overall) came home with one from Northeastern (182.4–117.5) on Wednesday and another from Boston University (155–145) on Saturday.

For the men's squad, two records were set at the BU pool. The 200 medley relay team — Brian Wisniewski, Billy Brown, Geoff Gear, and Henry Turner — set the record with a time of 1:37.55. Then, in the 100 breast, Brown set an individual record with a time of 59.63.

Wisniewski also won the individual events in the 100 back (59.93) and 200 back (1:56.84). Brown, after the record- setting performance, won in the 200 breast (2:08.11). B.J. Brannan took the 1000 free event with a time of 10:22.39, while Ryan Rose won in the 50 free in 21.97. In the 100 free, Chris Arsenault came in first with a time of 47.82.

In diving events, Ed Hefferon had the third best score in UMass history with 304.60 from six dives.

In the Minutewomen's victory over Northeastern, junior Elizabeth Risotto won two individual events and helped out on one team event, lifting the women's squad to a blowout. UMass took 11 of 16 events.

Risotto came in first in the 100 back (59.57) and the 200 back (2:08.18), and started off the 200 medley relay team (1:52.31), on which she teamed with Sarah Newell, Andrea Kazanjian and Julie Dragon.

Adding to Risotto's glory, Anne Dettloff won the 200 free (1:56.78) and the 500 free (5:11.05). Other individual victories includes Alexander's win in the 100 breast (1:10.35), Lia Lansky's top finish in the 200 fly (2:16.62), Andrea Spencer's win in the 50 free (25.31), Marci Hupp's win in the 100 free (55.08), Newell's victory in the 200 breast (2:29.79) and Kazanjian's win in the 100 fly (1:00.02).

After cruising through Northeastern, UMass' women's squad faced challenges as it narrowly defeated Boston University when the 400 relay team with Dettloff, Dragon, Hupp and Kazanjian came in first with a time of 3:35.39 in the last event on Saturday.

Again, it was Risotto who helped the women's swimming squad along the way by setting a school record in the 100 back (59.11) and winning the 200 back (2:06.32). Freshman sensation Dettloff won the 100 free (10:33.13) and 500 free (5:09.67) while her 400 free relay teammate, Dragon, won the 100 free (54.22).

"We were going into this with the No. 1 seed, so we were more or less expected to perform. George Washington came in at No. 8, it was a first round match, and they were sky high," he said. "They played great. Brian Stahl really came through in the fourth quarter to put us over the top."

With that match in the past, UMass looked ahead to No. 17 Bucknell. Bucknell nipped at the heels of the Minutemen for most of the match, but in the long run were unable to keep pace, allowing five goals in the third quarter and eventually dropping the match 11-2. All-American Stahl soared with four goals, and saw his teammates play great as well, with Chad Filiault, Gabriel Marrero, Brook O'Neill, Greg Trayer, Timmy Troupis and Aldo Roman all finding the back of the net at least once.

Russ Yarworth

But you don't shut down a team with individual efforts, and Yarworth knows it. For all the press and numbers a player like Stahl may get, it all comes down to how the team plays as a whole.

"That's how we have been able to get where we are now, by playing as a team," Yarworth said. "We have the opportunity to use our bench, and we do. It just demonstrates how we have been developing as a team. Our bench depth carries us, and hopefully that will be right through the postseason."

The two victories on Saturday allowed UMass to continue, and set up a much anticipated date on Sunday with rival Queens College. The last time these two squads faced each other was Nov. 1, when the Minutemen defeated them 10–5 at the CWPA Northern Division Playoffs to secure the top seed for this past weekend.

Yarworth's strong belief in his bench and teamwork proved to be prophetic on this occasion. Marrero, Roman, Slinguff and Stahl each had a pair of goals, while Cory Koenemann, Troupis and O'Neill also put one on the board for UMass. Goaltender Richard Huntley went the distance, finishing the evening with 11 saves.

With the match knotted at 10–10, the two teams were in the midst of sudden death when junior Slinguff scored to give UMass the game, the Eastern Championship, and a berth in the NCAA tournament.

In a game that remained close to the very end, O'Bannion came through several times with crucial shots. With 8:19 left in the second half, she hit a layup to break a 51–51 tie. She also broke a 24–24 deadlock in the first half with a three point shot and put the Eagles up by five with another three with 2:05 left in the opening half.

"She is a spark off the bench, both shooting wise and emotionally," Boston College women's basketball coach Cathy Inglese said. "She is just a bundle of energy, and we need to have that. So many people focus on the high scorers, but we need that spark."

Also coming in strong off the bench for the Eagles was freshman Becky Gottstein. A 6-foot-1 forward from Albany, NY, she pulled down seven rebounds, matching the total rebound contribution from the UMass bench.

With her bench struggling, O'Brien was forced to rely heavily on her starters. The extra burden, though, may have worn on the starters down the stretch.

"It wore us down to a certain degree," O'Brien said. "But they [the bench] played about the same amount of minutes as the starters did. They kept pushing it, trying to do what they needed to do."

Tez Kraft

"But if its time for you to make a play, then you need to make a play. If you're too tired, then maybe you're not the competitor you need to be."

Senior forward Tez Kraft and sophomore guard Kelly Van Huisen were the high points for UMass. Kraft recorded her second double-double of the season with 18 points and 10 rebounds. She also had a steal, a block and shot 7-for-14 from the floor.

Kraft hit a three with 14:14 left in the game to put UMass up by five. She followed that with a layup on the next possession to put the Minutewomen up by seven. That was their biggest lead of the game.

Van Huisen also hit big shots for UMass, including a buzzer-beating three to end the first half that pulled the Minutewomen within three at 33–30. She ended with 18 points, as well as three rebounds, four assists and a steal.

O'Brien, however, hopes that her bench will learn from last night's experience.

"I learned a little about Tonia [Thomas] tonight. I think she's going to be able to come in and do some things," she said. "We got into a little foul trouble with Jay [wanna Bradley] in the first half and she never got herself back for the second half."

"We're still a very young basketball team. We have a lot of inexperience and we need to learn from what we are doing. If you take a loss like this and learn from it, then maybe it's worth it in the long run."

Horoscopes

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You'll have more options to choose from than expected today. However, keep in mind that the test will be about making the right choice at exactly the right time.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — While intending to do something "big," you can quite possibly accomplish one or two small things today which will prove to be quite memorable.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may feel as though your efforts are being overshadowed by those of another, but you've already made your mark! By all means, be patient.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Your tolerance of those who do not yet know the rules will prove quite beneficial to you and those around you. Avoid knee-jerking reactions.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You may be privy to something that is quite rare and startling today. How you use the received information is most important.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Your perceptions may seem rather faulty as the day opens, so you'll want to sit back and take stock of things. Later, you'll be back on track.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Take your time today. Don't let others rush you into making any decisions that you may regret later. Use care, but don't be timid.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You can afford to be a little more relaxed and "laid-back" during much of the day. Don't worry; you'll know when you have to buckle down.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You'll have a time of it trying to control those around you with less experience, for there is a strange tendency to run wild today.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may be able to make a proposition to someone today which will be taken in just the right way. It will pay off in a manner you did not expect.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You'll be asking "what's in it for me?" on more than one occasion today. When your turn indeed comes, you'll have no doubt what is coming your way.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Guard against overspending today. Your financial resources must be watched over at this time with more care than usual. The evening will set the mood to reveal a secret.

Fifteen reasons to pay attention to college hoops

Amid the hoopla of this weekend's college football action, the excitement of another new "X-Files" episode and the euphoric joy of the Redskin's second win of the year, the 1998–99 NCAA men's college basketball season began this weekend.

What's that? You didn't notice? I find that hard to believe, what with the epic Purdue–UNC–Ashville and Duke–Fairfield battles that were waged. Did you catch Mississippi–Alabama State? North Carolina–Appalachian State?

That's okay. Maybe you need a little motivation, a little encouragement, a little push to get into the spirit for this season.

We're here to help. In no particular order, here are 15 reasons to watch college basketball this season (sorry, there's just not room for 25):

1. Duke. Hands down the best team in the nation, the Blue Devils feature All–American candidate Trajan Langdon, "the Alaskan Assassin," intimidating power forward Elton Brand and new point guard Will Avery, who takes over for the graduated Steve Wojciechowski. Plus, the Devils only recruited one player. Corey Maggette, and the kid can play — he scored 17 off the bench in Duke's opener.

2. As much as I hate to admit it, Connecticut will be really good and with All–American Richard Hamilton and sophomore Khalid El–Amin, the Huskies could even be fun to watch.

3. Keep an eye on coaching changes. Rick Barnes left a successful building project that had brought Clemson to national prominence to work on the Texas Longhorns. Tom Penders, the former head man at Texas, brings his ol' southern style to the Atlantic 10 as George Washington's coach. Mike Jarvis, GW's ex, takes over a Big East gig at St. John's.

4. It's likely Kentucky won't make the Final Four in Tampa this March, and there's even a chance they won't win the Southeastern Conference. Look for Jerry Green's Tennessee Volunteers to make some noise.

5. Mateen Cleaves and Luke Recker. The 6–foot–2 Michigan State point guard and the 6–6 Indiana swingman play basketball the way the game out to be played — all heart. Recker is a bit more seasoned, to look for Hoosiers' coach Bob Knight to pressure him. Cleaves, a junior, should have an even better year than his sophomore Big Ten player of the year campaign.

6. Louis Bullock. Michigan's top returning scorer will have the unenviable position of guiding a lackluster Wolverine squad through the Big Ten. After Bullock and Robbie Reid, Michigan's next best returning scorer, Brandon Smith, averaged a paltry 3.2 points per game.

7. Phi Slamma Jamma is back in the house at Houston. Former smooth–sailing NBA star Clyde "The Glide" Drexler has taken over as coach at his alma mater.

8. The best rivalry in college hoop — without question. North Carolina at Duke (Jan. 27) and Duke at North Carolina (Feb. 27).

9. One of the best players you've never heard of: Miami of Ohio's Wally Szczerbiak. The 6–foot–8 forward put in 24.4 ppg last year and has a .476 career three–point shooting average.

10. One of the better players you have heard of: Texas Christian's Lee Nailon. He didn't go pro because, well, the Lakers and the Knicks aren't quite the same as Brigham Young and Colorado State. So he'll terrorize the WAC again.

11. Dec. 9, 1998. Connecticut visits UMass' William D. Mullins Center for a battle that should be one of the most intense rivalries that arena has ever seen. This year's seniors were here when a Tim Duncan–led Wake Forest team was put down by Marcus Camby's Minutemen. The U–Game should be better.

12. A pair of Big Ten athletes get yet another chance at, well, conference mediocrity. Northwestern's Evan Eschelmeyer and Iowa's Jess Settles have each been granted a sixth year of eligibility.

13. There are some great names in college hoop this season: Tennessee's Vages Davis, Georgia State's Torquin Gresham, Pittburgh's Vontrego Cummings and my favorite, Nebraska's Cookie Belcher (I'm serious.)

14. And everyone thought His Airness was leaving the game behind. Not so. Penn and Detroit both sport Michael Jordans on their rosters.

15. Let's face it, Notre Dame stinks. The Fledgin' Irish have one positive: their recruiting class. Picked as the second–best group of freshmen in the Big East, David Graves, Troy Murphy and Harold Swanagan may be able to bring the Irish some luck.

UMass hoops opens season successfully

Men recover from first–half jitters to wrestle away win

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

The beginning wasn't as smooth as they had hoped.

After Lari Ketner won the opening tip–off of the Massachusetts men's basketball game against Niagara in the first round of the Chase NIT last night, the Minutemen began to stumble through their offense, scaring their fans and coaches alike before they reasserted themselves in the second half for an 87–73 victory.

Two steps past the mid–court line, guard Charlton Clarke whipped a pass to his right, where forward Ajmal Basit was in no position to catch the ball. The miscommunication sent the basketball bouncing into the scorekeeper's table, and turned the possession over to the Purple Eagles.

Upon the Niagara in–bound, Clarke was immediately called for a foul. The next trip down the court, small forward Mike Babul turned the ball over on the UMass baseline.

Not quite the arousing jackhammer slam that the Mullins Center crowd had in mind.

"Charlton played awful in the first half. Awful," UMass Coach Bruiser Flint said, singling out his starting point guard.

As a result, the Minutemen, who came into the game ranked 23rd in the nation and favored by 17 points, were played close by the Eagles throughout the opening frame.

Ketner was the catalyst in the first half for the Minutemen productivity from his center position, as he followed up his soaring swat of a Niagara layup with a fall–away jumper from the foul line with 14:30 to go before halftime.

However, the Minutemen seemed to have less intensity on the boards as did their opponents, and it took a jump–shot from the outside corner by reserve forward Winston Smith to bring UMass to a 22–22 tie with the Purple Eagles.

Trading baskets with Niagara, Massachusetts pulled ahead to a 33–30 halftime lead, but the unranked Eagles were much closer than any pregame expectations had planned.

When the Minutemen came out of the locker room for the second half, things were plenty smooth.

"It was a three–point game, and we felt we had a little momentum going," Niagara Coach Joe Mihalich said. "I was disappointed that we didn't come out a little tougher there in the second half."

This time around, Basit and Clarke combined for a dominating opening play. The power forward forced a turnover that led to a trifecta from the point guard, beginning a 9–0 UMass run. By the 18:18 mark of the second half, Massachusetts had built up a 42–30 lead off of a Ketner hook and a stop–and–pop jumper on the left baseline by shooting guard Monty Mack, who tallied a game–high 24 points.

"First game jitters? Yeah, I think in the first half, but not in the second half. In the first half, guys were out there forcing things. The guys were going nuts out there, actually," Flint said. The coach was also quick to point out that the team's play after halftime was far from flawless. "In the second half, and in the entire game, we just didn't communicate well, and (Niagara) is good enough that, if you make a mistake, they can capitalize on it."

Niagara's balanced scoring attack featured at least 14 points each from Terry Edwards, Kevin Jobity, Jeremiah Johnson, and Alvin Young, but could not keep up with the fast–paced Minutemen down the stretch, although they forced several scary scenarios for their hosts, including when they pulled within three — 50–47 — at the 10:30 mark.

However, UMass, with the help of a quick scoring spurt, had secured a ten–point advantage with nine minutes left in the final half.

That lead saw some slight fluctuation, but when the final buzzer sounded, Massachusetts was on the positive side of an overwhelming 87–73 score.

Ketner ended the game with 16 points, nine rebounds and three blocks, while Clarke put forth a solid ten point, seven rebound performance. Smith and backup point guard Jonathan DePina also racked up impressive games, each scoring nine, the latter pulling down six boards and recording a game–high three steals.

Next up on the docket for the Minutemen is St. John's, who destroyed UNC–Asheville in their first round matchup of the Chase NIT, scoring over 100 points. Now with the kinks worked out of their system, UMass should be ready to compete.

Ketner shakes triple teams to lead UMass past Niagara

By Aaron Soykin
Collegian Staff

Even Massachusetts men's basketball coach Bruiser Flint admits that his squad's opponents must be crazy if they don't double–team his talented center Lari Ketner.

And how can you blame him? He knows that his team doesn't always shoot well. As a result, it makes sense for the opposition to blanket the inside players.

But, there's a catch to smothering him. it is a gamble — the result of which is completely in the hands of Ketner to either win or lose. If he's able to find an open teammate, and if that teammate connects on his shot, it will be a long night for the UMass opponent.

After facing a swarm of double and triple teams last night during the 87–73 Minuteman victory over Niagara, Ketner scored a hard–earned 16 points and somehow managed to find an open man along the perimeter, committing only one turnover in the process.

"We really felt that we had to scratch down [under the hoop] to make it tough for Ketner to score," said Niagara coach Joe Mihalich, who hoped that swarming Ketner would give his team a fighting chance to win if UMass couldn't hit its outside shots. "We knew coming in, that if they shot the ball well, it was going to be a tough night for us.

And much to the dismay of Mihalich, the Minutemen did connect on enough outside attempts to creep past his pesky Purple Eagles, who were in complete agreement that guarding Ketner can be a Catch–22 if he's on top of his game. Double team him, and he'll find the open man, but leave him one–on–one, and he'll have your front court for breakfast.

"We didn't do a great job on [Ketner], but we tried to make it difficult for him to score inside," Mihalich said. "I think he's become as good a frontcourt player as there is in the country. Bruiser's done a great job developing him."

After drawing a number of double and triple teams last season, both Ketner and Flint were not at all surprised that their first opponent this year would utilize the same tactic. With plenty of time to prepare him, Flint helped his three–year starter pass his first test of the 1998–1999 campaign with flying colors.

"You'd be a fool not to play him like that. Any team that plays us has to play him like that," Flint said. "You'd be crazy not to. Ketner would get 100 points. I thought Larry did a good job [getting] out of the double teams with his passing."

Despite his uncanny ability to utilize a variety of finesse and power moves underneath the basket, Ketner also seemed comfortable passing out of the post — a role which he feels will be crucial for him to divert the double and triple teams that can hinder his scoring success.

"Coach [Flint] pretty much figured that they would do that...and I was able to start getting guys shots and they started hitting shots," said Ketner of Niagara's plan to keep him in check. "It didn't surprise me. I'm pretty much going to look at that all year...I kind of expected that, and i just wanted to be strong in the post and get it out to my guards and small forwards."

Even his back court teammates, namely shooting guard Monty Mack (24 points), can't help but appreciate Ketner's remarkable ability to find the open shooter. And with small forwards such as Winston Smith shooting well from the perimeter, Ketner has finally found someone to make his job easier.

Minutewomen fall to Eagles 72–66 in a hard fought affair

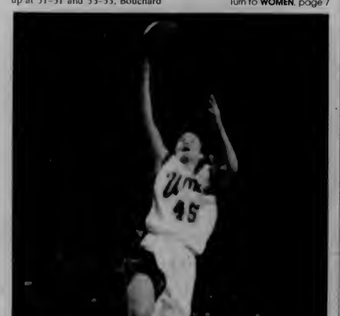
CHESTNUT HILL — The Massachusetts women's basketball team fought valliantly on the road, but eventually succumbed to Bay State rival Boston College 72–66 last night at the Silvio O. Conte Forum.

The contest was a nip and tuck battle until the final buzzer, but superior BC defense and outside shooting eventually proved to be too much for the Minutewomen.

"We allowed too many open shots," Massachusetts women's basketball coach Joanie O'Brien said. "They took advantage of the opportunities they were given, which meant the difference in this game."

Boston College [1–0] jumped out to an early edge, leading 17–11 just 10 minutes into the game, but UMass [1–1] compiled a 14–2 run, sparked by four points and two assists by Alison MacFarland.

That spurt was followed by a 10–0 clip by the Eagles, but UMass was able to regain their composure and only trailed 33–30 at the break.



The Minutewomen came out like gangbusters in the second half, pulling ahead 49–43 with 12:09 left on a Yolanda Rayside layup.

From there, the tide began to turn in the Eagles favor, as Cal Bouchard drilled an open three–pointer off a nifty feed from Alissa Murphy. Two ensuing UMass turnovers led to two easy baskets by BC, including a three from Murphy. That bomb gave the Eagles a 51–49 lead with 8:56 to play.

While UMass knotted the score up at 51–51 and 53–53, Bouchard put BC ahead for good with a trifecta at the 6:46 mark.

"Cal's shot seemed to put us in solid standing," Boston College women's coach Cathy Inglese said. "It took a lot of momentum away from UMass from that point on."

Boston College bench puts Eagles over the top

CHESTNUT HILL — In Saturday's season opener against St. John's, Massachusetts women's basketball coach Joanie O'Brien was able to use her entire team in pulling out an 83–66 win.

Last night, however, O'Brien saw very little contributions from her bench. In 37 minutes, UMass' bench contributed just four points, an assist, seven rebounds, shot 1–for–7 from the field, had eight fouls and six turnovers.

Boston College, on the other hand, received substantial contributions from its bench. They played 56 minutes, chipped in 14 points, three assists, nine rebounds, shot 6–for– 14 from the floor, collected five fouls and had just two turnovers.

"Your bench is like that sometimes," O'Brien said. "There were so many hand check calls early in the game that it took everyone else out of their game. I can't expect too much from my freshmen or my new players because they are still getting used to all of this."

Danielle O'Bannion, a sophomore guard out of Arlington, Va., was a main force off the bench for BC. She finished with 10 points, shooting 50–percent, including two–of–five from three point range.

Water polo downs QC to advance to NCAA's

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

If a poll was to be taken of the athletes around campus on what the scariest phrase in sports is, you would undoubtedly receive a wide range of answers.

However, there is one that would, and does, consistently place at the top of the list: sudden–death overtime. An otherwise well–played game quickly becomes meaningless as the smallest of mistakes can suddenly spell disaster.

The Massachusetts men's water polo squad, led by CWPA Coach of the Year Russ Yarworth, headed this past weekend to the Collegiate Water Polo Association Eastern Championships in Providence, R.I. as the No. 1 seed. Little did they know that before the weekend was through, they too would have a date with "death."

Peace accord gets approval in Mideast

JERUSALEM (AP) — Israel's parliament today overwhelmingly approved the latest Mideast land–for–peace accord with the Palestinians, paving the way for an Israeli troop withdrawal from West Bank territory.

The Knesset endorsed the agreement by a vote of 75–19, with nine abstentions. The approval was a vote of confidence in Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who signed the agreement with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat at the White House last month.

Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat defused the latest crisis that threatened parliamentary approval by earlier disavowing violence and endorsing negotiations to achieve a permanent peace agreement.

Netanyahu called Arafat's pledge "positive" and appeared to interpret it as backing down from threats to unilaterally establish a Palestinian state in May, perhaps using force.

On Monday, the Israeli prime minister had suspended Israel's troop withdrawal from 2 percent of the West Bank, scheduled for later this week, until Arafat retracted the threats.

After reviewing Arafat's latest statements, Netanyahu adviser David Barillan said the prime minister "considers this a retraction."

Vengeful students had access to guns

BURLINGTON, Wis. (AP) — Five boys accused of planning a bloodbath at their school in revenge for being teased had access to an unlocked box of guns owned by one their fathers, police said.

The boys, all 15 or 16, planned the plot in detail, down to snipping phone lines and taking top administrators hostage, investigators said. They had intended to carry out the attack on Monday at Burlington High School, but an informant tipped police, and one of the students said it was all a joke.

Neither police nor the town of 9,500 was laughing in light of a series of school shootings in other states.

Each of the five boys had singled out people they intended to shoot, said Gary Large, assistant police chief.

The boys told investigators they were going to use 9mm, .357–caliber and .44–caliber guns owned by one of their fathers, Large said. The father kept the guns in an unlocked box, he said.

"Initially, when they first made this plan they knew exactly what guns they wanted and where they were and in fact how to get them," Large said.

Some of the boys also told police they had another source for weapons, Large said.

The five were rounded up Sunday night. They remained in custody yesterday under suspicion of conspiracy to commit murder.

Report examines rape, sex assaults on campus

By Rachel Uranga
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the first in a five–part series examining rape and sexual assault on college campuses.

Undergraduate students make up 79 percent of sexual assault victims on campus, according to a report released by the Everywoman's Center Counselor and Advocate program for the Sexual Assault Advisory Committee Direct Services Division.

The report details sexual crimes including physical and verbal assault, reported on campus or by those affiliated with the University between July 1997 and June of this year.

Seventy–five cases of sexual assault were reported last year. Victims were most often white, young females living on campus. Seventy–seven percent of the victims were between 17 and 22 years old. Three men reported being victims of sexual assault.

According to the report, most victims knew their attacker. Twenty–five percent of the perpetrators were acquaintances, and in 18 percent of the cases they were ex–partners and partners. Only 11 percent of the victims identified their attackers as complete strangers.

More than half the victims said they were not using drugs or alcohol during or before being assaulted. Perpetrators were using drugs or were intoxicated in 28 percent of the cases. But in the case of rape, victims and offenders were more likely to have used drugs during the attack. According to the report of the 28 incidents reported, 5 offenders were partners, 5 were ex–partners and 2 were friends, while 11 of the offenders were acquaintances.

But, "because the majority of sexual assaults still go unreported," rape statistics, the report states, are often misleading.

Sixty–two percent of these crimes happened on campus, while most all occurred at the victim's home. Rapes were the most frequently occurring type of assault with 28 rapes recorded, a 35 percent jump over the 1996 academic year.

Director of Everywomen's Center, Carol Wallace, said the University's extensive counseling and rape education services may account for the relative increase in rapes reported.

"[We] do a better job of reporting than most campuses do, because we have one of the strongest campus–based services in terms of prevention and education. It's the only rape crisis services located on a college campus in the state of Massachusetts," Wallace said.

Of those rapes nine occurred "somewhere" on campus and five in a residence hall. Both Southwest and Orchard Hill had two incidents of rape and Sylvan had one.

Southwest, with nearly half of the University's residents, reported the highest rate of sexual assaults, 13.

Nine rapes were reported in Amherst and four in other areas in Massachusetts, where most graduate and staff members reside. Graduate and staff members comprised less than 10 percent of the victims.

Plans for new Orchard Hill lot postponed

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

Plans for a new purple lot outside of the Orchard Hill residential area have been halted, according to Mike Brennan, director of Parking Services.

"It doesn't look like it's going to happen. The paving companies close down during the winter time," he said.

He explained that the weather recently turned too cold to begin paving.

During an Oct. 21 Student Government Association senate meeting, a motion written by Senator Ari Molovinsky (Van Meter) was passed to create a purple parking lot in the field adjacent to Dickinson Hall in Orchard Hill.

Molovinsky said his impression is that there will not be a new lot in the near future.

"There was a lot of opposition from some residents in Orchard Hill. The motion was unanimously passed in the meeting," Molovinsky said.

At the meeting, some students opposed the proposed lot because the area is used for recreation by Orchard Hill residents.

Molovinsky said he is looking into the possibility of turning lot 46 and lot 29 in Central area, into purple lots.

"I don't want to give up. Parking is still a problem. It's now a matter of finding out now how many health services, dining services, and maintenance staff park in those lots," he said.

According to Molovinsky in an Oct. 22 Collegian article, $30,000 was available from parking services to begin construction on a 50–space lot.

However, at a space allocation meeting, the construction proposal from Brennan was rejected because according to Molovinsky, "they didn't really know if students wanted it."

Molovinsky said he will possibly write a motion to go before the senate proposing changing lots 46 and 29 into purple lots.

Senator Brendan Hart (Central, at large) said the Space Allocation Board is deliberately trying to stall the lot from being built.

"They [Space Allocation Board] shut him [Molovinsky] down and didn't even give him a chance," Hart said.

Stephanie Green, a freshman in the Stockbridge school of agriculture, has found the lack of parking spaces in the Orchard Hill/Central area an inconvenience.

"It would be really good to have another lot. I have to park next to the Mullins Center," she said. "Sometimes I come back late. I don't like walking back up from the Mullins Center by myself."

Residents play fun game of murder and deceit

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students are out to "assassinate" their residential peers as part of their involvement in an active game in the Orchard Hill Residential Area.

The game is called "Assassins." It mimics the movie Gotcha and has evolved to be played with paintballs. In this web of murderous deceit, students are given the name of a resident which they have to conceivably "assassinate." As a result, every student is assigned to "kill" another student, but also has to be careful not to get killed themselves.

The assassinations are completed when the assassin has successfully slapped a piece of "stick–em" paper onto his target. Instead of a dead corpse, the murderer receives the assassinated's target, and thus another person to kill.

The game was organized by Seniors Neal Durham and Alan Basque, Orchard Hill Residential Assistants (RA). They came up with the idea as a result of its past success as an RA program. In previous years, the game was directed toward a single residence floor, but Basque felt that the game would be more involved and suspenseful with an entire cluster participating.

"In an effort to enable residents to become better acquainted with their buildings, we decided that it would be fun to open it to the entire Webster/Dickinson cluster," Basque said. "Other RAs informed me that it would be quite a success and from what I have seen, people have become really paranoid about it."

Durham and Basque started the event by forming a list of interested students and then organizing the list according to alphabetical order. They randomly assigned individuals with similar names to get each other. Durham feels the most difficulty was in getting it organized.

"It took me about 12 hours to organize 216 people," Durham said. "There have even been problems of people banging into people's rooms to kill them."

The resulting effect is a tangled web of deceitful targets and "killers," running around Orchard Hill in suspense.

UM student entrepreneurs take a stab at small business ownership

By Aaron Brandes
Collegian Correspondent

Four students have utilized the resources at the University of Massachusetts to open a local Amherst business.

About two years ago, John Lobello, Andrew Bosquet, Brian Parsons and Sarah Drost noticed a void in the local community. They perceived a culture of clothing, dance and music spreading all over the country that was heading for Amherst.

"There was a niche where we thought we could enter. The culture from the cities was reaching small towns like Amherst, but we were still having to go to New York and Boston in order to buy records," Bosquet said.

The students put all their resources into a business that would address that need.

The students run a local store called, "Growroom," which specializes in clothes, tapes, compact discs and records. They have tapped into the resources of the University to successfully maintain their business.

"We are able to run a booth every Thursday in the campus center for practically nothing. We are able to tap into one of the top business programs in the county where we have gotten advice on business plans, contracts, computer programming, budgeting, advertising and general business theory," Drost said.

All three attributed much of the Growroom's success to the support they have recieved from University faculty.

"Now we have a personal investment in our classes," Lobello said.

Growroom staffers are receiving support from other local business owners. The entrepreneurs have recieved a variety of support from other young businesses such as Bueno y Sano, The Pub and The Java Hut.

"Whether it be a visit to our store, some friendly advice, or just letting us know we're not crazy for doing this, some local businesses have really helped," Drost said.

Bosquet, and Drost attend UMass as full–time undergraduate students. They spoke about students trying to balance 15 credits and a part time job.

"When it is your business, and your neck is on the line, there can be a lot more stress, but we have managed to merge the two opposing forces," Drost said.

While it's hard to own a local business and attend college full–time, the owners of the Growroom believe they have fused their theoretical education with their practical lives.

Abu-Jamal's future bleak, death row may be last stop

By Danielle Fugazy and Laura Forster
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: This is the final article in a series on the case of death–row inmate Mumia Abu–Jamal vs. Pennsylvania.

The Unitarian Universalist Society of Amherst had people crammed into every possible corner of their small meeting house, on Sunday, Nov. 1.

The reason: a fundraiser to help pay for the defense of Mumia Abu–Jamal. And with the re–election of Pennsylvania Governor Thomas Ridge, a proponent of signing Jamal's death warrant, their cause is growing ever more charged as decision time seems fast approaching.

Jamal, the journalist convicted of killing Philadelphia police officer Daniel Faulkner, is waiting on Death Row for the decision of whether his case will continue to the Federal courts or be denied, in which case he will be executed.

According to the Philadelphia Inquirer, 20 Jamal supporters who protested a Philadelphia City Council meeting on Thursday, Nov. 12 made little impact on the meeting and council members.

At the fundraiser on Nov. 1, Leonard Wienglass, Mumia's lead counsel said things were looking bleak for Mumia these days. He explained to the supporters that Judge Albert Sabo, who is presiding over Abu–Jamal's case, has sentenced more people to death than any other sitting judge in the United States.

Sabo is a life member of the Fraternal Order of Police, and has been branded as a "defendent's nightmare" by the Philadelphia Inquirer.

During his first trial, Abu-Jamal was denied the right to represent himself, and was defended by a lawyer who has since been disbarred. Also, since the first trial five new witnesses have come out saying there was another individual at the scene and they have lied about it because of police intimidation.

According to Weinglass, Abu-Jamal was driving a cab the night of the incident, a second job he had aside from being a radio journalist. There was a dispute out on the street that night involving Mumia's brother. Mumia got involved and both he and police officer, Daniel Faulkner were shot.

Faulkner died. Several witnesses say they saw another shooter flee the scene, and Mumia's legally registered .38 was never decisively linked to the incident.

Weinglass described Abu-Jamal as a journalist who has been reported by a Philadelphia magazine as one of the top 10 men to watch, because of the good he did for the public. At one point he had been President of the Philadelphia Association of Black Journalists. The Philadelphia Inquirer called him, "an eloquent activist not afraid to raise his voice."

Abu-Jamal's radio broadcasts exposed inappropriate police dealings with the poor and minority communities. Weinglass also said Abu-Jamal had no police record but 12 years prior to the incident he had been a member of the Black Panther Party, and was quoted saying, "Political power is out the barrel of a gun." This information made it to the jury according to Weinglass, while other positive information about Abu-Jamal's past did not.

Mumia's supporter's found Weinglass' talk right on target. Gina Palumbo, of Holyoke said the talk was "incredibly and really unbiased and Weinglass spoke passionately about Abu-Jamal."

Martin Espada, an award winning poet and professor of English at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, read from his latest work Zapata's Disciple with the Amandla chorus accompanying him. The chorus sang songs in a variety of lanuages from areas which have suffered injustices, such as a Zulu song "Amandla," meaning power, from South Africa.

John Edgar Wideman, a Rhodes scholar and professor of English at UMass, read a chapter from one of his books All Stories are True as well. The fiction book, is based on his brother who is also imprisoned under the Pennsylvania system, and offered insight to the thinking that starts to take over people's minds when they are imprisoned and how important hope becomes to a prisoner.

Chinua Thelwell, 17, of Amherst, who learned of Mumia through a KRS1 rap song, said "I liked Wideman's reading" and brought Mumia's book Live from Death Row so he could learn more about the case.

Many supporters complained that there not being enough media coverage on Mumia. Jossette Henschel, of Amherst, said "there is so little about it in the media, and it is very hard to accept because [Jamal] was so obviously framed."

Shelbourne librarian, Louis Battalen, said "this just shows there is still concern about the Black Panther Party, and Mumia represents both an artistic and expressive element and the whole event was a lovely affair."

Whether the success of Jamal's supporters will gain momentum in the near future may be made apparent by the effect of future demonstrations from groups such as the Western Massachusetts Mobilization for Mumia organization, like today's 4:45 p.m. protest in the Springfield Federal Building.

If not, perhaps only the Pennsylvania law will decide the future of Mumia Abu- Jamal.

According to Bosquet, the 15 month journey since the Growroom opened last September has been a learning experience.

"It has been the most intense learning I have ever gone through," Bosquet said.

The store owners are careful to disclaim the image of the Growroom owners as hanging around and listening to records all day.

"There is a difference between surviving for a year and fulfilling a dream," Lobello said. "Fulfilling our dream is more than just knowing the music, we are constantly learning how to run a successful business. There is more reason for me to be at class now then ever."

The students said they feel the store has a responsibility to give back to the community. They believe the Growroom can serve as a model for students.

"We want the possibilities of the Growroom to rub off and inspire students. Students can identify with us because we are also students. When they find out we own a local business it makes their ideas more realistic," Drost said.

The store's owners said they have received help from UMass students. UMass interns execute the accounting for the store, most of the murals splashed around the establishment are products of art students, local music is sold and promoted, and clothes that are tailor-made from students are also sold.

"Together, we are making a statement that students can take a more active role in voicing demands for new products and services offered by the Amherst business community," Drost said.

The progress of the store in the first 15 months has shifted from doubt to confidence, among the students involved with it said.

"Before it was a process of questioning, now it's about accomplishing feats and tasks. Everyday the skepticism drops a notch. When this is made more realistic and possible, it makes other dreams possible," Bosquet said.

"We promote a standard that goes beyond the store and into the community, we realize every aspect of the store is directly related to how much heart and effort we give," Lobello said.

The store's owners stressed the importance in representing their love for music in and out of the Growroom environment.

"It's all about making the entire scene positive, that's the key. There is a buzz of energy spreading throughout this area and we want to represent that energy, we want to promote that energy, and put that energy in every place where the Growroom name is attached," Bosquet said.

Low-income students face growing college costs, less federal aid

By Robin Estrin
Associated Press

BOSTON — The cost of college continues to rise as available federal grant money erodes, putting higher education out of reach for many low-income American families, a study released yesterday showed.

Student grants are covering a significantly diminishing proportion of college pricetags. Pell grants — the major federal funding source for low-income students — provide about half of what they did 20 years ago, according to the study.

In the 1976-77 school year, the average Pell grant covered 19 percent of the cost of attending a private, four-year institution, and 39 percent of the price of a public four-year school. In 1996-97 — the most recent year available for the study — the average grant covered 9 percent for private schools, and 22 percent for public.

Even more striking, the maximum Pell grant — given to the neediest students — fell from covering 35 percent of private college costs in 1976-77 to 13 percent in 1996-97; for public schools, it dropped from covering 72 percent of the price to 34 percent, the study said.

If low-income students don't attend community college, they can't afford to go to college at all, said Thomas Parker, senior vice president of The Education Resources Institute, a Boston-based nonprofit guarantor of privately issued student loans, and one of the two groups that released the report.

"What we like to think is we have a system where people have both access and choice, but what we're rapidly developing is a system where people have access but not choice," he said.

The average Pell grant award declined by 23 percent — adjusting for inflation — over two decades, but college prices rose by 49 percent, and family incomes crept up by just 10 percent over the same period.

In 1996-97, the maximum Pell grant available was $2,470 for qualifying students. In 1997-98, it went up to $2,700 and is at $3,000 for the current year.

"Even with those increases, the bottom line is the net price still increases for most families, particularly for the lowest-income students," said Jamie Merisotis, president of The Institute for Higher Education Policy in Washington, D.C., and co-author of the report.

About 3.6 million of the nation's 14 million college students receive Pell grants, and more than half of Pell recipients in four-year schools qualify for the maximum amount of funding.

To prevent utter disorder, Durham and Basque developed "safety" areas in which students could not be tagged by their assassins. Permanent safeties included residents' rooms and bathrooms, so students cannot be tagged unless a resident invites the assassin into their room. Daily safeties were also arranged and included wearing underwear on the outside of clothing, wearing two different pairs of shoes, and walking around with toothbrush in mouth.

In one particular instance, a resident went to her target's room dressed up as a MassPIRG representative. In pretending to be advocating for the Arctic campaign, she went to her target's room with a fake petition and waited for her target to sign the form before she "tagged" her dead.

"Students have come up with some clever plots on how to kill their targets; it's been a lot of fun," Basque said.

Other unique experiences that have occurred included a resident calling an RA saying they were locked out of their room, though they only wanted to tag him. Freshman residents Emily Hawke and Nancy Miller went to great lengths to disguise themselves; they even changed their names and voice mail.

"We went to all of our classes with our underwear on the outside of our clothing," Hawke said. "No one would be able to kill us that way."

In another instance, a resident chased his target from Webster to Dickinson before the target chose to sleep off campus to avoid getting tagged.

Durham and Basque felt that the program has been a success and hope to carry it through in other semesters. Other parts of campus are also implementing the game for their residents, in hopes of inspiring panic around the University.

VT court to hear same-sex marriage case

By Ross Sneyd
Associated Press

MONTPELIER, Vt. — For the first time ever, tickets are required to sit in one of the 80 straight-backed wooden chairs inside the state Supreme Court's high-ceilinged, austere chamber. That's because an overflow crowd is expected today, when Vermont takes center stage in the national debate over whether to recognize same-sex marriages.

Claiming discrimination, three gay couples — Stan Baker and Peter Harrigan of Shelburne, Nina Beck and Stacy Jolles of South Burlington, and Lois Farnham and Holly Puterbaugh of Milton — sued last year when their town clerks refused to grant them marriage licenses.

A Superior Court judge dismissed the suit in Dec. 1997, but lawyers for the couples appealed to the state's highest court, which will hear arguments from both sides today.

The case now appears to be the best current hope for advocates of gay marriage and the worst fear for its opponents, after voters in Alaska and Hawaii approved referendums that would allow those states to define marriage as a union between a man and a woman. The buildup to the case known as Baker v. Vermont is unusual by state standards. Plans were made for extra security and for issuing tickets to the first 60 people who show up.

The other 20 spectator seats are to be reserved for the three couples and lawyers.

In addition, lawyers will be allowed to argue their cases for an hour — at least twice as long as normal.

"It certainly seems unusual if not unprecedented to me," said Attorney General William Sorrell, who argues that marriage is restricted to a union between a man and a woman. "I think some of it is because of the Alaska and Hawaii constitutional votes earlier this month."

Hawaii, more so than Alaska, was viewed as a state likely to permit marriage between couples of the same gender because of previous court rulings. Election Day results dampened hopes in both states.

The lawyers pursuing the Vermont case prefer not to characterize it as a national issue.

"This case in Vermont is very important in Vermont," said Mary Bonauto of Boston-based Gay & Lesbian Advocates & Defenders, a lawyer working on the case. "It's about what do Vermont's guarantees of equality mean for Vermont citizens."

The couples have said they're pleased to be getting their day in court.

"Twenty-five years ago when we met and fell in love marriage was not something any of us that were same-gender couples thought about," Puterbaugh said when the suit was filed last year. "It just was not in the conversation, it was not in the thinking."

Get N or get out

I used to make fun of my friends Joe and Rich because they were PlayStation fanatics.

You know the types, they yell when they miss plays, schedule tournaments among their friends, talk about the games as though they have actually been played on real grass with real people.

During the football season it would be football on the screen, during basketball season, basketball. They lived vicariously through the teams that they so carefully selected, kept track of points and rankings. They were really into it.

The PlayStation was always on.

As girls, my neighbor Jenn and I were systematically excluded from these games, but we didn't mind. I think it was actually more fun to sit and watch these games than it was to actually participate.

Elsa Allen

When games were not being played, the PlayStation was used as a CD player. A screen would appear on the TV that held all of the controls for the CD player and we would sit there and stare at it for hours.

You know how when the television is on at a party, people can't help but sit around and watch it, even though they can't hear what is being said or really follow the action at all? It was the same principle with the PlayStation. No matter what was on the screen we would watch it.

We named the CD screen "The Show" and actually grew quite fond of it as the year progressed. Even when Joe and Rich got a real stereo we would go over and request a special viewing of "The Show," just for old times sake.

But this is not my point.

After three years of being excluded from PlayStation and the games that I simply will never learn how to play, my exile has been relinquished.

Joe and Rich, I have seen the light!

We got Nintendo.

Old school Nintendo.

There is no feeling more exhilarating than being able to pick up a controller that I have not held for nearly eight years and play the game as though I was back in junior high.

But, this has created a problem in my household.

Now that we have games like "Super Mario Bros." and "Rad Racer" our lives have slowly taken a turn for the worse.

The phrase, "Just one more game and then I'll go study," rings repeatedly throughout our living room. We walk around, eyes glazed, wrists cramped, hands aching from what Joe tells me is a disease called "Nintendo hand."

Last night, as I was trying to fall asleep, I could have sworn that I heard the sound of Mario grabbing coins, but it seems as though I was hallucinating.

We now take Nintendo breaks from studying. Our living room has turned into a den of slack, games strewn across the rug, each seat arranged to maximize the Nintendo view.

Jenn, who is my roommate now, revels in the fact that she beat the game yesterday. Granted she used the "Game Genie."

"But that doesn't matter," she says.

We have competitions that would put those PlayStation junkies to shame. And girls can be so much more cruel.

"You suck!"

"Bitch, you made me get eaten by that flying duck thing."

We need a support group.

My mother called the other day with something that she felt was important. It was her unfortunate luck that she caught me in the middle of a very heated game of "Mario Bros."

"Elsa.? Elsa, is that Nintendo I hear in the background?"

My mother is quite familiar with the Nintendo, having taken it away from my brother and I numerous times for using the "Duck Hunt" gun as an actual weapon.

"No mom, I don't know what you're talking about. Crap, I just lost my fire power, uh... ah... what's up?"

"Elsa, turn that off and listen to me, this is important."

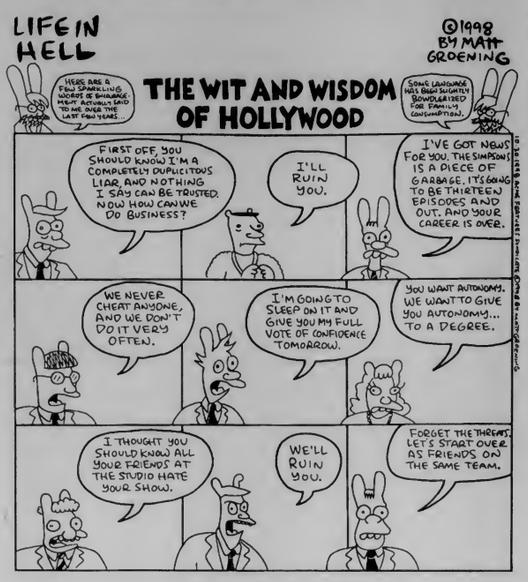
"This is important too, oh no, I just got nailed by giant spikes from the ceiling." My Mario is now running around, the size of a pea, and I am getting increasingly irritated at the disturbance.

"Look mom, I have to go, you're making me lose."

Click, dial tone, she hung up on me.

In the immortal words of Will Smith (when he was The Fresh Prince): "Parents just don't understand."

But roommates do.



We go in for another game. We begin to place money on who we think will win, Mario or Luigi? We stop going to class. We fail out of school. The only thing that we have to put on our resumes is "beat Tetris fifteen times."

When I was twelve I had no idea that Nintendo had the potential to destroy your life.

Scary.

Well, I've gotta go, Jenn's waiting. We have a "Pac Man" tournament to start.

The big dig

At an archaeological dig in 4023 in Amherst, Massachusetts, which, as a state, rejoined with Maine (yes, we split up a long time ago, check the history books) to create the perfect state (Maine rocks; get that through your skull):

Here we are in the great metropolis of Amherst, where there once stood a town-like set of structures that is known as the "University of Massachusetts." After the great, bee-led apocolypse of 1998 (remember that column?), our history has been wiped away. The only reason we know that there was once a "University of Massachusetts" here, is because the locals always seem to mention it when they drink. We believe that's where the term "UMassing" came from, which, obviously, means to become inebriated.

We've begun to find all sorts of amazingly interesting artifacts that will shine some light on the long-extinct lifestyle of these primitive inhabitants.

Because of skeletal remains, we know that these people walked upright, though their behavior sometimes seems more like the neanderthals than the modern homo sapiens that now roam the Earth.

At several particularly perplexing sites in this relatively small area seem to be religious burial grounds. Instead of human remains, though, we see large deposits of aluminum cylinders, all with slightly different glyphs colorfully decorating the outside.

The common theme with these cylinders seems to be snow-capped mountain ranges. We think that the people here associated these mountains with being closer to the heavens, and that perhaps the cylinders were statuettes of stout gods and goddesses that were buried as a sacrifice. Based on footprints that have been fossilized over time, we know that large groups of inhabitants gathered in these areas to take part in these important religious meetings.

When in a particularly pious mood, the natives here would partake in sexual rituals that involved unprotected intercourse with random others. We think that these acts are, once again, dedications to those above, as modern day locals tell stories of how those taking part in these rituals would yell, "Oh God, Oh God, Yes, Yes!" while going through this detailed procedure.

Still other sites here are even more befuddling to the scientific mind. One area contained orange, textured spheres scattered about over a rectangular hardwood floor. We think at one time there were several rows of seats extending high up around all sides of this rectangle. Perhaps this place was a pilgrimmage center for the residents of this area.

One possible series of events is that the people would first gather for a ceremonial burial of the aluminum cylinders, and would then travel in immense numbers to this center where they would pray to the particularly tall individuals among them. It is thought that certain tall inhabitants were messengers to God, as they would perform a strange dance involving the orange spheres, perhaps representing suns, and would be revered by the others. These tall "chosen ones" were perhaps seen as closer to the heavens.

Seth Koenig

For recreation, these people would travel to a central building that locals call the legendary "Whitmore Administration Building," where they would be sent on an elaborate scavenger hunt that would extend as far as the ancient city of Boston. Goals for these hunters would be things like signed papers and working appliances. The few that didn't die on these torturous trips would have special priviledges, like parking their archaeic vehicles in lots closer to the buildings.

Another peculiar aspect of these inhabitants' lives is that, unlike today, people slept during the day and stayed awake at night. It is thought that the natives here saw the darkness as a better time to take part in their strange burials and sexual acts. The only ones who slept during the night were the tall "sun-handlers," who were often exhausted by their spiritual dances.

Throughout all of our excavating, though, we must be careful not to disturb the fragile artifacts and buildings that are kept safe and intact by God's gracious hand. The huge, red brick building that stored these peoples' books, for instance, easily falls apart when dug around. We assume that, when standing, the building frequently shed bricks down upon the civilians. Perhaps the superstitious inhabitants thought that the gods were angry at them, and thus, few ever approached this storage center.

There are questions surrounding this mysterious culture that we may never be able to correctly answer, but we can always study to try and find out more.

That's info–tainment!

My teeth are as white as Vanna White's and a kung fu master can slice a brick on my rock-hard abs. I can store my Food Dehydrated Turkey Jerky in vacuum-sealed freezer bags on my way to Don Dupree seminar "How to Be Financially Independent — Without Leaving Your Chair."

All this and I still have time to "lose up to 50 pounds by enjoying a variety of delicious soups on the Aspen Diet."

Ah, a girl can dream can't she? When this girl has insomnia or accidently sets her alarm clock for 4 instead of 8 she is prone to watching some infomercials. I watch them with the giddy excitement of Ron Popeil tasting chocolate pasta for the very first time ("Chocolate pasta, mmm delicious" he exclaims as the painted hair on his head stands on end. "And the kids love it!")

The power of infomercials is awe-inspiring. Something about those capped smiles and technicolor sweaters worn by out-of-work gameshow hosts cancels out every rational thought in my head. Luckily I have insufficient funds, a tiny and tattered shred of dignity and a fear of anything that "slices and dices, without muss or fuss."

"The Dalai Lama is wrong about the key to happiness — slow jams from the '70s and '80s featuring Mr. Luther Vandross are so very zen."

Julie Fialkow

The other day I was watching a favorite infomercial of mine: "Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore." In this one-hour cooking program, brilliantly disguised as a long commercial (or is it the other way around?), Florence "I do naughty things with Crisco" Henderson, is shown the sheer splendor of a set of cooking pots. You learn that when you shove frozen veal, uncooked pasta, and a bottle of sauce into the magic pot, in five minutes you have a savory veal parmigana meal! You are amazed by how easy it is to clean! You wonder how much the dumb shlub sitting at Flo's kitchen table are getting paid to act orgasmic over kitchenware.

I realize many things while watching these shows. One: Four easy payments of $29.95 plus $13.95 shipping and handling equal a whole lot of Ramen and beer money. Two: the Dalai Lama is wrong about the key to happiness — slow jams from the '70s and '80s featuring Mr. Luther Vandross are so very zen. Three: think of the seas of impressionable minds you could navigate, if you had your own infomercial, hmmm...

Pan in on a small intimate setting; a cozy living room with floral wreaths and pink candles. It's me, Tina Yothers from Family Ties, Suzanne Sommers' daughter and all the girls from "Just the Ten of Us;" we all have impossibly dewey skin and laughter reminiscent of church bells.

"Hi, welcome to Beauty Chat', I'm Julie Trousseau (that's my infomercial name) and these are my best girlfriends in the world. Today we're just having some tea and talking about our worst beauty nightmares, right girls?"

The group tee-hees and nods. Yes, on goodness, yes, they exclaim.

"So, Tina, it's been awhile since we've seen you on the small screen," I say, "what have you been up to?"

Tina sighs and her eyes well up, "Actually Julie, I have been somewhat in hiding. I have had terrible acne ever since my days on Family Ties. I never got to become a drug addict like other child actors my age because I didn't go to parties. I stayed at home and ate chocolate chip ice cream- which as you know just makes the acne worse..."

I interrupt before things get ugly. "But then you met me and things were better right? I gave you Julie's Secret!"

Tina and the other lovely ladies exchange knowing glances as I take out my panacea — it exactly resembles a garbage bag. They all ooh and aah. Tina puts the garbage bag over her head.

"My gosh, her skin looks perfect." Suzanne Sommers' daughter says.

"You can't even see that hideous acne now!" I say.

The last time the Ten of Us girls hug the garbage-bagged mass that is Tina.

"I used to weigh 450 pounds," said Suzanne Sommer's daughter. "My mom wouldn't even let me on her thigh master commercials as a before."

We all look at her empathetically. She then runs through a giant blown-up before photo of herself. She has the giant trash bag. I mean "Julie's Secret" on, as she struts around the room looking stunning.

Ms. Sommers explains how she couldn't eat because she tied the bottom of the bag and had no use of her hands. "Men really love it too, I've gotten more comments on the street... They seem alarmed by my sexiness! Before I wore a garbage bag over my body, men never noticed me!"

All of a sudden, in there is a knock at the fake door. Who could it be? It's that stud-puppy Eric Nies from the Real World and The Grind!

"Hi ladies!" he says.

I get up and give Eric a warm embrace. "Eric, hon, what are you doing here? Don't you know this party is for ladies only?"

"Well, I just wanted to stop by and say that I think garbage bags are hot. Real hot, so."

The instrumental version of "The Greatest Love of All" comes on and I sit down and have a one-on-one with the audience, who can un, somehow see me into my living room.

Back to reality — I'm not Julie Trousseau, and I don't even know Tina Yothers. The absurdity of it all is that marketed right, you could probably sell me some garbage bags. With the right lighting, the right music, and the right celebrity has-been, I'd buy oceanfront property in Arizona. As long as I had my Ambervision glasses to shield me from the bright beach sun.

Hillel group looks at Judaism in millennium

Role of religion discussed by Jewish community

By Chanel Dubofsky
Collegian Correspondent

Where is Judaism headed? In a small group discussion held at Hillel House last night, members of the Jewish community at the University of Massachusetts attempted to answer what might be seen as a difficult and daunting question.

The conversation was facilitated by Ranaan Dani, who has experienced Judaism in a broad spectrum. Dani, raised in a secular home, has also explored Orthodoxy, as well as lived in Israel.

The question of the fate of Judaism in the 21st century was approached by the group in the form of four basic questions.

What does it mean to be Jewish? According to participant and Hillel Program Director David Arfa, American Jews are "fragmented as to what it means to be a Jew." While some Jews gravitate towards religion, Arfa also says that for others the connection may be something as small as "good kugel."

Regardless of how one feels connected to his or her Judaism, the general consensus of the group was that the key to being Jewish lies in discovering what is important to the individual. Therefore, it remains the duty of the older generation, and the Jewish community, to ensure that young Jews have positive religious and cultural experiences.

Next, the group was handed the question: What reason is there to be Jewish? For some, Judaism is something they accept as part of themselves from birth, like eye color or curly hair. Several group members expressed their ambivalence towards admitting they were Jewish in light of anti-Semitic sentiments around them.

One student talked about an experience she had in elementary school when other students had thrown pennies at her Jewish friend. Dani also mentioned the idea of the Jews as a chosen people, and emphasized that they were not only chosen, but chose God in return.

"When we forget what started it, we forget what it means to be Jews," Dani said.

The meaning of the continuation of Judaism was also discussed. Participants considered their individual futures as Jewish people, and whether or not they will choose to pass on the traditions of Judaism to their children. The group discussed how having Jewish children demonstrates a commitment and love of Jewish culture, religion and history. It means, according to Arfa, providing a "vision of life of which the basis is the celebration of being alive."

The group also confronted the issue of Jewish trauma, or specifically, healing from events such as the Holocaust. Dani discussed what he referred to as the "Holocaust complex." This, he explained, is the idea that the Holocaust, and events like it, are etched into the minds of young Jews early on, and they continue to respond to them.

The Jews, Dani said are a "hurt people," and it is important to "return to Judaism as a whole." The way to this is to stress not only positive aspects of being Jewish, but also to remember the fact that despite all the attempts to annihilate the Jewish people, it remains a strong and vibrant world culture and religion.

The question of where Judaism will be in the new millennium is not one which can be answered by a small group of people in one evening. This provocative discussion caused the group members to confront their own feelings, positive and negative, about their place in the Jewish world.

In the end, all agreed that being Jewish is an integral part of their lives, and one they wish to pass onto their children. As Dani put it, Judaism is something that he is still questioning, but above all he says he feels that it is "in my soul."

Raanan Dani led a discussion on "What's Next for Judaism?" in the Hillel House last night.

A night of friends

Come experience "A night of a 100 Friends," the fourth annual Falafel Ball. This college dance party is also referred to as the Biggest Jewish Party of the Year.

"I'm really excited for this year's Falafel Ball, it's a great way to experience Boston's nightlife and mingle with other Jewish students from surrounding Boston area colleges in a club setting," said Michelle Veyvoda, a junior communications disorders major and an attendee at last year's gala.

The party is going to be held tomrrow night, Nov. 19 at Paradise and M80 Night Club. The club is located at 967 Commonwealth Avenue Boston, also the Green line T stop for Boston Univeristy.

Doors open at 10 and the party lasts until 2 a.m. It will be 18 and over to enter or college ID and 21 to drink. The Control Group, Adrianne and DJ Eddie K will be providing the entertainment with UMass Alumnus Jon Unger taking the stage later in the evening.

Surrounding schools that will be there include: Harvard, Brandies, MIT, Boston Univeristy, Emerson, Wellesley, UMass, Brown, Bentley, Emmanuel, Simmons, Northeastern, Tufts and Babson. The event is supported by local Hillels, fraternities and sororities. The event will costs $10 for all UMass students. The price includes transportation and admission. The proceeds go to benefit Chaverim Shel Sholam, Jewish Family and Children's services. Please RSVP as soon as possible to the Hillel House at 549-1719.

UMass Hillel House receives fourth award for outstanding programming

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

For the fourth time, the University of Massachusetts Hillel has received the 1998 William Haber Award, granted by Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life.

Only two other individual Hillels have received the Haber Award four times.

"We are thrilled that UMass Hillel has won the Haber again this year," Saul Perlmutter, Hillel Director and Rabbi said. "This clearly puts UMass Hillel in the elite of Hillels nationwide."

The award recognizes campus Hillels that have demonstrated outstanding programming with the goal of creating "vibrant" Jewish life on campus, according to Debbie Morgan, Director of Community Relations for Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life.

UMass Hillel was recognized this year for a series which ran during the last school year, "Making Choices of Loving, Living and Dying."

"UMass had a very thorough and involved series which covered the gamut of different life issues affecting Jewish students," Morgan said.

UMass Hillel was awarded in 1980 for the "Rap Groups" program, in 1985 for a Jewish Awareness/Anti-Semitism Program and in 1989 for "Carving Coalitions Out of Conflict."

The four programs making up the "Making Choices of Loving, Living and Dying" series dealt with intermarriage, the environment, sickness and death and Jewish identity.

"Perspectives on Intermarriage: A Panel Discussion" ran at the end of October last year. The intermarriage panel included a formerly Christian man who converted to Judaism after he married a Jewish woman, a Jewish woman currently in an intermarriage and a student who grew up in an intermarried family in which the mother eventually converted to Judaism.

In mid-November, "Our Environment: Spiritual and Moral Choices" featured Jewish, Buddhist and Evangelical Christian perspectives.

A Jewish healing expert and a family physician presented "Helping Others Deal with Sickness and Dying," a program which dealt with topics including Judaism's opinions on euthanasia and life support.

The final program in the series, "Hide and Seek: Reclaiming Jewish Identity After the Holocaust," featured author Louise Kehoe. Kehoe wrote In This Dark House, a chronicle of her personal search for her Jewish identity after discovering that her father had hidden his Judaism from her family.

The four programs were a sampling of what Hillel offered the community last year.

"I am impressed that our calendar is always filled with wonderful programs," Perlmutter said. "This award, plus what we do every day at Hillel, make me proud to be part of UMass Hillel."

Jewish World War II veteran remembers Holocaust

Speaking and teaching about experiences, Cohen survives memories of death camps

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

He stands over you, white-gray hair shining, glasses reflecting you, in a beige cardigan sweater with brown leather buttons and tissues in the pocket.

He's grandpa.

Like a grandfather, he shows you old photographs, bound in books of leather and floral cardboard.

"This is Buchenwald," he says. "This is Patton."

This is David Cohen.

A Jewish man in his 80s, Cohen is not reminiscent of a soldier. The tissues in his pocket give him away. But his alter ego is Sgt. David Cohen of the United States Army, Fourth Armored Division, Third Army. He fought through Eastern Europe in World War II. He walked in on one of the greatest disasters of all time, the Nazi death camps. As a soldier. And as a Jewish man.

"You have a little more depth to your feelings than people who weren't Jewish," Cohen said. "You have bitterness and anger."

In April 1945, Cohen's division came upon Ohdruf, the first camp liberated by American forces. The soldiers arrived at the camp after it had been liberated, but not before S.S. Guards had lined up about 45 camp prisoners "and shot and clubbed them to death, rather than let them be liberated."

"You know, war is hell," Cohen said. "But what we saw is beyond description."

"We were walking around dazed. We couldn't believe what man could do to other man."

Cohen's division continued on to Buchenwald, a camp Cohen described as "major league."

There he and his fellow soldiers saw the ovens and gas chambers in which Nazis killed a proportion of the millions annihilated in the death camps.

There he saw oil paintings and lampshades made of human skin.

From darkness into light

Survival is not just retaining a hold on life. It is retaining a hold on the entire self, the psyche and the mind. Cohen kept his pictures in a drawer for 30 years, but he survived.

Cohen is a speaker with the Veterans Education Project, a training ground which helps veterans share their stories with young people.

The Jewish Living Community is located on the second floor of the Hillel House.

DAVID COHEN / VETERANS EDUCATION PROJECT

David Cohen stands as a World War II soldier in 1943.

The Veterans Education Project, Cohen has been able to continue what he started as a teacher.

"I tried to teach the kids that it was more important to learn to be a human being than to learn when Christoper Columbus came to America," Cohen said.

"Hate is worse than any kind of disease we could have."

Transcending disbelief

When Cohen spoke as part of a panel last Tuesday night, a young man spoke in disbelief, "I can't believe that dude was there."

The disbelief could be hard to face. There are people who believe that the Holocaust of which Cohen witnessed a piece never happened.

But Cohen said he has never met any of them. He has only been up against over 50 "skinheads holding signs that said 'Jews are Cockroaches'" at the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, DC.

"My first impulse was to punch them in the nose," Cohen said. "My second was to show them this book of pictures."

"This is Buchenwald," Cohen said. He should know.

JLC offers change from the norm

Location, kosher food and the people entice

By Renee Cohn
Collegian Correspondent

Hillel's Jewish Living Comunity (JLC) is looking for applicants for occupancy for the Wintersesslon and Spring semesters.

Located on 338 North Pleasant Street, Hillel House is a Jewish housing option for interested sophomores, juniors and seniors.

Dan Deutsch, Resident Assistant for the Jewish Living Community, stressed the ease of living "between downtown and the main part of campus."

"You're no more than two minutes from either; it's a perfect distance from wherever you need to go," he said.

Valerie Fisher, a junior at UMass spending her first semester in JLC, has spent the past two years in regular on- campus housing.

"It was nice in the dorms," she said, "but I was ready for a change Living at Hillel is like being off-campus, but still has some of the conveniences of dorm-life."

Some of these conveniences are laundry machines, campus accessibility, and social life, which Fisher said is one of the best things about living at Hillel.

"It's really nice living with people who understand each other, people who are all Jewish. There's a lot of respect here, and because of that we have a great time," Fisher said.

JLC students participate in activities such as bonfires in the courtyard, floor-wide movies in the cable TV-equipped lounge, and even occasional cookie bake-offs in the spacious kitchenette.

When a specific event isn't planned, Fisher said, "everyone just hangs out and has a good time in the lounge."

Deutsch emphasized the quietness of living in the Jewish Living Community at Hillel.

"There are great places to study or just take some quiet time," he says. "We have our own library and a great courtyard. There are all sorts of nooks and crannies where you can go to unwind."

As far as the actual dorm rooms are concerned, they're some of the biggest on campus. Down the hall is a kosher kitchenette with cabinets and a large wooden dining table.

For those who eat their meals on the kosher meal plan, the dining room is in the downstairs of the Hillel building, serving all kosher meals, in addition to free Shabbat dinners after Friday night services.

"The food in the kosher dining hall is definitely better than the dining commons on campus," Fisher said.

There is room to house twenty-six people in the Jewish Living Community. The rooms are double, but singles are available by request and if paid for.

If interested in becoming part of JLC, contact the Hillel office at 549-1710.

Arafat disavows violence

By Laurie Copans
Associated Press

JERUSALEM (AP) — Two days of back-and-forth threats came to a close yesterday after Israel welcomed a verbal commitment by Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat to disavow violence and forge ahead with the peace process.

The crisis over inflammatory remarks Arafat made Sunday was the latest in a series of flareups to plague the U.S.-brokered land-for-peace accord signed last month in Washington.

Several hurdles still remained, however, before Israel starts carrying out a troop withdrawal from 13 percent of West Bank territory.

One day after the pullback was to begin, Israeli legislators were still debating the Mideast accord. Lawmakers were getting their first look at withdrawal maps and were to vote late yesterday on the deal.

Coming out of a map room in the Knesset, right-wing lawmakers expressed shock at how isolated some Jewish settlements would become after the first pullout, from 2 percent of the area. Others complained the government was hiding the truth from them by only posting a map for the first phase of withdrawal.

Naomi Blomenthal, a staunch member of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud party, looked close to tears after viewing the maps and said it was one of the hardest days of her life. She did not say how she would vote on the accord.

Michael Kleiner, a right-wing lawmaker in Netanyahu's coalition, complained that two small Jewish settlements near the Palestinian city of Jenin in the northern West Bank would be surrounded by Palestinian-controlled areas after the first pullout takes place.

Back to the glory days of U2 & Bosstones Live Album

THE BEST OF 1980–1990/THE B-SIDES
U2
Island

The holidays are coming up, and as a result we are bludgeoned by a barrage of "greatest hits" and live compilations. Hence, U2's latest release, a collection of all the singles from 1980–1990 and their B-sides. This double disc set is a nice piece of nostalgia for those of us who can't stand the synthetic schlock of Zooropa and Pop. It's the kind of album that makes you crack to a friend, "Hey, remember back when U2 was actually good?" Oh, it brings a tear to the eye.

The first disc contains, for the most part, material from the albums The Unforgettable Fire, War and The Joshua Tree, plus all the stray singles. The second disc is all B-sides. Some we are familiar with, some we are not. Both discs take you back to the glory days of U2. Back when The Edge's guitar had that familiar jingle, the instrumentation was simple and everyone wished Bono would just shut up and sing. Before they were dressing up as the Village People and doing bad pelvic thrusts. But, most importantly this album forces you to look back at the U2 of today and the U2 circa 1987 and say, "What the hell happened to these guys?" Distressing, but a bittersweet return to when the band actually had something to say. B (Kevin Monahan)

U2, looking fierce, pops back onto the scene with a compilation of some of their old hit on The Best of 1980–1990.

LIVE FROM THE MIDDLE EAST
The Mighty Mighty Bosstones
Mercury

Another live album. But this time from a band whose live performances are their strong suit. If there has been a CD released lately blatently marketed as a holiday gift, it's this one. The green packaging and the picture on the disc of the pitbull logo with a Santa Claus hat and a wreath around his neck kind of give it away. Also, the "Hometown Throwdown" shows that this album was recorded at took place close to Christmas last year. If you were at one of these shows, this album is a real treat.

The cover art is a photo of a street corner all too familiar to Bostonians: the corner of Mass. Ave. and Brookline Ave. in Central Square. Home of clubs like Man Ray, T.T. the Bear's Place, and most importantly, the Middle East. This album has all the favorites like "Devil's Night Out," "I'll Drink to That," "I Hope I Never Lose My Wallet," "Kinder Words," "Where'd you Go?," "Someday I Suppose," "Hell of a Hat" and "The Impression That I Get," the song that made them more popular than granulated sugar, from their last studio LP, Let's Face It.

If you're a fan of the Bosstones, this album is essential. If you've never seen the Bosstones live, get your tickets early to the next Hometown Throwdown, show up at the Middle East early, and buy the album afterwards as a souvenir. Bonus if they play all 20 songs featured on the album. B+ (K.M.)

AMERICANA
The Offspring
Columbia

The Offspring paint a pop-punk picture of our lovely land as it is for many: strip-malls, fast food and dead-end jobs. Chord changes galore, speedy drumming and expletives are tailored towards angst-ridden teenage boys everywhere.

The radio hit at the moment is "Pretty Fly (For A White Guy) with its catchy "Give it to me baby" line. It sounds like a poor rip-off of their own "Come Out and Play" from a few years back.

There are a few surprises: a punk version of Morris Albert's "Feelings" and a reggae-ish ditty complete with kettle drums called "Why Don't You Get A Job?" that includes guest vocals from Larry "Bud" Melman of David Letterman Show fame.

The disc closes with a funny mariachi band version of "Pretty Fly." The Offspring's latest is pretty tame after all is said and done. C (Matthew Nixon)

INTENDO
Bis
Grand Royal

With the release of Arab Strap's Philophobia earlier this year, Belle and Sebastian's The Boy With the Arab Strap a few months ago and now a new album from Bis, it seems as though were experiencing attack of the Glaswegians. Bis is adorable and fierce at the same time, a Scottish band that has their collective feet in the door of an overseas cult following. Mandra Rin, John Disco and Sci-Fi Steven are just too cute.

Intendo is a great idea; a collection of all the rarities and demos, or as the band puts it in the liner notes: "songs caught in-between the 'proper' albums." The power punk collides head-on with the disco pop, sending notes and chords bouncing through your speakers. The demo version of "Famous" is loads of fun. If you're not familiar with Bis, this is a good place to start. Teensy Power! A– (K.M.)

LP5
Autechre
Nothing/Warp

These are digital days. Lasers track 5-inch discs whirring away inside black boxes. There once was a time when needles traveled along grooves to give us the sounds that we would remember our lives by.

Trax On Trax Off

For kicks many would play these records at 45 RPM instead of the 33 1/3 RPM called for long-playing vinyl albums. The result was a borderline cacophony of new sounds good for a few laughs.

With the year winding down and the millennium's demise not far beyond, Sean Booth and Rob Brown, a.k.a. Autechre, update the speeded up record phenomena of a prior age to produce this year's techno breakthrough.

LP5 is their fifth compact disc loaded with experimental sounds and a minimum of melody. Anything resembling a traditional tune is hard to come by on this.

"Acroyear2" is seven minutes of speeded up glory. Sci-fi soundtrack? Video game on the blink? This is dance music way before its time — electronic music that is both warm and cold.

The contemporary structure of "Rae" suggests earlier, more contemplative material from the band. Organ-like sounds float in and out while all kinds of homemade beats flutter around the soundscape. The track's synthetic simplicity is a testament to the beauty that machines in the right hands are capable of producing.

The new sound returns with "Vose In" with sounds suggestive of steel blades cutting metal and modems connecting to a service provider over a slow beat.

"Fold4, Wrap5" is a multi-layered sound creation constructed out of a thought-provoking combination of fast- moving beeps and droning bursts of sound.

"Under BOAC" has the only semblance of vocals on the disc. Muffled rants that can best be described as either cryptic messages received from distant galaxies or shortwave radio distortion attempt to rise above the metallic beat.

Nobody else is doing this kind of thing. There is only room for one Autechre. Tired of the same old thing? This is the solution. A (M.N.)

YOU'VE COME A LONG WAY, BABY
Fatboy Slim
Astralwerks

Norman Cook, a.k.a. Fatboy Slim, has done it again. One of last year's more creative and noteworthy albums was his Better Living Through Chemistry disc. This one is as funky, emphasis on fun. This guy used to play bass in the pop-folk outfit The Housemartins before he began his transformation into club music guru. His remix of Cornershop's "Brimful of Asha" sent the group to the top of the British charts. Norman Cook has the magic touch.

The tracks on this, for the most part, are dense Big Beat affairs full of all kinds of repetitive vocal samples and clever musical touches. "Right Here, Right Now" kicks things off with hollow beats, touches of sitar and snippets of some orchestra. "Rockafeller Skank" is the high point and one of the year's top tracks. It is a perfect blend of cool vocal sample: "Right about now, the funk soul brother" and layering techniques that include a twangy, country sounding guitar. So cool and catchy that its seven minute length is just too short.

Don't wait for the year's best-of lists to determine what to buy — pick this up now. A (M.N.)

FORM & FUNCTION
Photek
Astralwerks

Rupert Parkes a.k.a. Photek is one of the pioneers of the drum 'n' bass sound. Combining beats with the low drone of bass, this techno hybrid fills clubs night after night around the globe. This disc allows Parkes to collect many of the long out of print 12-inch singles he has released under the Photek pseudonym and compile them on CD for the first time.

Original versions of classic tracks appear alongside new remixes by the likes of J Magik and Doc Scott. "Rings Around Saturn" with its sample of Pharoah Saunders' jazz tune "Astral Traveling" is worth checking out. Two new tracks are included: "Santiago" features playful horns alongside guitar licks while "Knitevision" chugs along with delicate keyboard flourishes thrown in for color. B+ (M.N.)

THE PACE IS GLACIAL
Seam
Touch and Go

Seam are a band in a constant state of flux. Front-man Soo Young Park is the only leftover from the band's earliest line-up, which included Mac from Superchunk on drums. Somehow, on their third release, Seam play like old friends, handling Park's trademark unpredictable dynamics and stuttering rhythms with ease.

Like other Seam albums, this one flowers only with repeated listening. Above all, the songs are tight, every note ties into the melodic direction of the songs. There's no pointlessly pretty flourishes here. Soo Young Park's quiet, almost spoken vocal delivery adds to the over all atmosphere of patience and care. There's passion in that level of restraint and control.

The album's highlight is the first song, "Little Chang, Big City," with its perfect downshift from loud pop to ghostly noise. There are moments like that in every song. Seam's music will not seize you. It waits for you. B+ (Rob Roensch)

Flutie's heroics at BC still linger 14 years later

(AP) — The NFL renaissance of Doug Flutie is a reminder of one of the great plays in college football history, a last-second desperation pass that turned into a Hail Flutie completion.

Tucked away in the back of every football team's playbook are ideas to be used when all else fails. When the last seconds are ticking off the clock and no other options remain, it's OK to throw up a prayer and see what happens.

What happened to Flutie and Gerard Phelan 14 years ago Monday gives hope for all hopeless situations.

It was college football's version of the Immaculate Reception, a 48-yard touchdown pass that really traveled 64 yards and carried Boston College past Miami, 47-45.

This was one of those games that leaves defensive coordinators wondering if they shouldn't be in some other line of work. Flutie and Bernie Kosar, main rivals for the Heisman Trophy that season, were like a couple of heavyweights, throwing haymakers at each other all day.

As time wound down, Miami led 45-41. BC had one play left, one last chance. In the huddle, Flutie dipped into the back of the playbook.

"The play was called Trips Right, Flood Tip," Phelan said. "That meant three receivers to the right side, flood the zone and try for the tip. I was the guy in the middle. I was the one who decided whether to tip it."

Flutie took the snap at the Miami 48 and while Phelan and friends headed downfield, the quarterback started scrambling. He turned one way and then the other, running around, looking for some room to set up and throw. Finally, with no time left on the clock, he stopped at the BC 36 — 64 yards away from where the ball needed to be — and unloaded the pass.

A knot of players had settled at about the 5-yard line. Phelan left them there.

"I was in the back of the pack," he said. "I needed to get into the end zone. The 5- or 6-yard line was no good. It looked like it was going to be tipped into my arms."

That never happened.

Instead, Flutie's pass sailed right past the leaping pack, right into Phelan's chest, almost as if it had been drawn there by some invisible magnet.

Touchdown, Boston College.

This was not as hopeless a play as it sounds. The Eagles had pulled it off earlier in the season at halftime against Temple and nearly made it work against West Virginia.

"There's some luck involved with all those bodies flying around," said Phelan, now vice president of sales for a printing company in Boston. "We won two out of three. If you get touchdowns on two out of every three plays, you're doing pretty good."

This was better than pretty good. This was special, an electrifying moment made all the more memorable by the circumstances. It was the day after Thanksgiving, the only game being played, shown on national television. It was an underdog team with an understized quarterback going against the defending national champions.

"All the elements were in place," Phelan said. "It was very exciting in a desperate situation. But never in my wildest dreams did I ever imagine it would have the lasting implication it has."

Fourteen years after the fact, Flutie has Buffalo in the hunt in the AFC East.

"Doug has that knack," Phelan said. "He gets people to rise to the moment. I talk with Doug every now and then. I talk about Doug a lot."

For his part, Flutie seems almost annoyed about always being reminded of that one play.

"It's like the only thing people think I have ever done in my life," he said. "It's taken on a life of its own. It was 14 years ago and history and they should get over it."

Glavine edges out Hoffmann for the NL Cy Young Award

NEW YORK (AP) — The NL Cy Young Award returned home yesterday. Tom Glavine edged reliever Trevor Hoffman to win his second NL Cy Young Award, the sixth time in eight years an Atlanta Braves pitcher has earned the honor.

"It's a good feeling to be part of a pitching staff that has won as many awards as we have," Glavine said. "It's great to get it back in the organization after Pedro [Martinez] won it last year."

In the closest balloting for the award since 1987, Hoffman received the most first-place votes but fell 11 points short of Glavine, who appeared on three more ballots.

The 32-year-old left-hander became the first Cy Young winner not to receive the most first-place votes.

Another Padres pitcher, Kevin Brown, was third with eight firsts, eight seconds, 12 thirds for 76 points. Glavine's teammates, John Smoltz, the 1996 winner, and Greg Maddux, who won the award from 1992-95, tied for fourth with 10 points each.

Glavine, who also won the award in 1991, led the league with 20 wins and was tied for third with a 2.47 ERA. He became the sixth NL pitcher to win the award more than once.

"This validates what I did in 1991," he said. "If you look at the list of multiple winners, it is pretty select company. It is something to be proud of."

Glavine received 11 first-place votes, 13 seconds, five thirds and was left off three ballots for 99 points.

Hoffman had one of the most dominating seasons ever out of the bullpen, saving 53 games in 54 chances for the Padres. Hoffman got 13 firsts, five seconds and eight thirds. The San Diego pitcher was left off six ballots for 88 points.

The 32 voters from the Baseball Writers' Association of America list the top three pitchers on their ballots.

The last time the NL Cy Young vote was this close was 1987, when Steve Bedrosian beat Rick Sutcliffe by two votes and Rick Reuschel by three.

The last time any BBWAA award winner failed to receive the most first-place votes was in 1995 when Seattle's Lou Piniella beat Boston's Kevin Kennedy for AL Manager of the Year. It happened three times in MVP voting.

"It just goes to show that a lot of guys had great years and deserved consideration," Glavine said. "I'm not concerned with how many votes I got or first-place votes I didn't get. I had enough to get the award."

For much of the season Glavine wasn't even the best pitcher on his staff.

Maddux appeared to have wrapped up the award at the All-Star break with a 12-2 record and 1.54 ERA. But he struggled down the stretch, going 6-7 with an un-Maddux like 3.18 ERA. He finished 18-9 with a league-leading 2.22 ERA, but couldn't join Roger Clemens as the only five-time Cy Young winners. Clemens won his fifth AL award Monday.

"Realistically I thought Greg was the clear-cut winner into August," Glavine said. "Barring something crazy, I didn't think I could catch him. I got on a roll and took advantage of the fact that Greg was not Greg in most people's eyes."

Glavine's win returns the award to Atlanta. Martinez won last year, and Maddux won in 1992 for the Cubs, the year before he signed with the Braves.

Smoltz finished 17-3 with a 2.90 ERA in a season in which he was twice on the disabled list with an inflamed elbow.

"This is something we all want when the season starts," Glavine said of his Cy Young Award winning teammates. "We are competitive from the standpoint that we want to keep up with each other and not be the weak link on the staff."

Hoffman allowed less than a baserunner per inning and struck out more than one batter per inning. He went 4-2 with a 1.48 ERA. Only four NL relievers have won the award, none since Mark Davis with San Diego in 1989. Hoffman received a $50,000 bonus for placing second.

"It takes an astronomical season for a reliever to win it," Glavine said. "Even then, it's hard unless a starter doesn't have a big year."

Brown, who helped knock Glavine, Maddux and Smoltz out of the playoffs, finished 18-7 with a 2.38 ERA. He received a $10,000 bonus for his finish.

Glavine's award came three days after he got married and puts a bright mark on a season that once again ended short of a World Series championship for the Braves.

"I wanted to have the wedding first so no matter what happened with the award, I'd be happy," he said. "This is a nice belated wedding present."

Yankees showing interest in Belle

NEW YORK (AP) — Albert Belle may be interested in playing for the Yankees, but it's still unclear if New York wants him. Yankees general manager Brian Cashman returned Tuesday from a dinner with Belle and his agent in Tucson, Ariz. But George Steinbrenner hasn't met with the controversial outfielder and the owner sounded as if no offer has been made.

Steinbrenner said he was awaiting a recommendation from Cashman, manager Joe Torre and his other advisers.

"That's up to others to tell me if they're interested," Steinbrenner said. "It's what my GM wants and my manager wants."

Belle, under a special clause in his contract, is a free agent but has until Dec. 2 to return to his deal with the White Sox, which has three years remaining and guarantees him $35 million.

Neely calls it a career for the Black and Gold

First things first, the Cam Neely story, which unfortunately did not turn out the way it should have. As you may have heard, Neely, the once premiere power forward of the NHL, was unsuccessful in his recent comeback attempt.

The former Bruins superstar, who is the second-quickest 50-goal scorer to date, scoring 50 goals in 49 games in the 1993-94 campaign, had to call off his return to the NHL Monday. I tell you Bruins fans and all hockey fans, it is a crying shame that someone with so much talent and pure heart had to leave the game so early.

The NHL is doing a great job now

James Murphy
The NHL

under head disciplinarian Brian Burke to ensure the safety and decency of the game. It's too bad Burke wasn't in that position in May, 1991 when Ulf Samulesson laid a cheap knee check on Neely in the Eastern Conference Finals.

That cowardly act by Samuelsson would eventually end Neely's career and alter the future of the Bruins.

• Remember when Neely put Samuelsson's cowardice on display in March of 1992. Neely, who had missed about two months leading up to this late season match-up with Pittsburgh, had already lit the lamp twice that day when he received a vicious cross-check to the head by "the coward."

As Neely got up off the ice his teammates had already circled "the coward," preventing him from retaliation. Amazingly, no call had been made! So, on the ensuing face-off Cam took matters into his own hands. As "the coward" turned to Neely and trash-talked him, Neely without hesitation transformed "the coward's" head into an ice pick, carving a model of his face into the "Gahden" ice. As the crowd erupted "the coward" huddled up like a cocoon, refusing to face the wrath of Neely's revenge!

Of course, there are so many more Neely memories but revenge is oh so sweet.

• Now, onto news and gossip around the league.

• What gives with the Red Wings?

As of Tuesday, the two-time defending Stanley-Cup Champions were 8-8. At this time last season they were 13-2-1, soaring towards another title. Fans in Motown have to be just a tiny bit worried, as the surprising Hull-less Blues sit atop the Central Division.

Dallas, as expected is the team to beat so far. Brett Hull netted his 1,000th career point Saturday, making Hull and his father Bobby the only father-son duo in history to hit that milestone. Still, beware of the high-octane Red Wings as they can pull ahead of the pack anytime with such a potent offense.

• Hey, how about those Coyotes... There has been reason to howl in Phoenix as the former Winnipeg Jets are off to their best start ever at 8-2-2 trailing first place Dallas by two points.

• In the East, Philly has fallen into a little slump. They are now tied with the Islanders for third in the Atlantic Division. What does G.M. Bobby Clarke have to do to bring a cup to the City of Brotherly Love? Maybe, tell Eric Lindros not to decapitate opposing players as he almost did with a vicious elbow in a game against Ottawa earlier this month. If Philly hopes to be playing in June, Lindros must play a more disciplined game.

• The newcomers of the East, the Toronto Maple Leafs hang above the rest so far at 9-6-2 and in first place in the Northeast division. About two more months and Maple Leafs Gardens will be locked-up for good. The Gardens is the only remaining arena from the NHL's original six teams [Boston, Detroit, New York Rangers, Toronto, Chicago and Montreal].

For you Ranger fans, M.S.G. was renovated twice, so it doesn't count.

• Horrible coaching struck twice in Tampa Bay as Lightning coach Jacques Demers left a bewildered goalie Bill Ranford in for all 10 goals in a 10-2 loss to the Rangers. To make matters worse, Ranford was left in for eight goals in a 8-2 loss two games later. I don't know about you, but if Ranford just didn't have it those nights, why not take him out, save him and the team some embarrassment and probably a few visits by Ranford to the team shrink.

• Congratulations to referee Paul Stewart, who recently reffed his first NHL match since completing a successful hard fought battle against colon cancer.

• Lightning forward John Cullen was also attempting a comeback from colon cancer, and is the first pro hockey player to return from a bone marrow transplant. Cullen had a seven-point game for the Cleveland Crunch of the IHL after being demoted by Tampa last month.

Round two of the Chase NIT's for UM

Minutemen travel to St. John's for a clash with Red Storm

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

In the recent past, a trip to St. John's Alumni Hall would be nothing out of the ordinary for coach Bruiser Flint and his Massachusetts men's basketball team.

After all, their motto has always been "Have game, will travel." Hostile arenas, elite programs, and NBA-bound opposing players have never seemed bother them... perhaps until now.

When UMass travels to Jamaica, N.Y. for tonight's Chase Pre-Season N.I.T. second-round match-up with the Red Storm, it won't be just another average big road game — not with former George Washington coach and Atlantic 10 foe Mike Jarvis pacing the sideline for his new team, St. John's.

In his eight seasons (1990-91 through 1997-98) with the Colonials, Jarvis posted an overall mark of 152-90, including 9-8 winning record against UMass. Jarvis also earned one of those nine victories during the 1995-96 campaign, when his team upset the No. 1 ranked and previously undefeated Minutemen, dealing them their only loss of the season until the Final Four.

During that game, UMass coach John Calipari was ejected, and Flint, an assistant at the time, assumed control of the team for the remainder of the game. Since his first one-on- one match-up against Jarvis, Flint has coached the Minutemen to a 2-2 record against him. And although the college and players may be different this time around, Flint admits that any team coached by Jarvis may provide a variety of headaches.

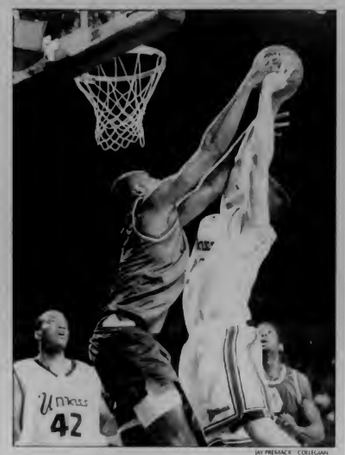
"I know their personnel a little bit, plus Mike [Jarvis]," Flint said of St. John's. "The only thing they don't have is size, but they've got guys who can put the ball in the basket and really score."

The winner of the Minutemen/Red Storm contest will advance to the semi-finals of the tournament, which will be played on Wednesday, Nov. 25 at Madison Square Garden. If UMass emerges victorious, the will likely meet No. 5 ranked Stanford, who returns all but one player from last season's Final Four team.

One of the keys for UMass success will undoubtably be highly-touted UMass center Lari Ketner, who will be 35-50 pounds heavier than the players slated to guard him. The projected first-round NBA draft pick managed to score 16 points against Niagara despite facing constant double and triple teams. Although Jarvis is extremely familar with Ketner and his abilities, Flint feels that his center's past success of 17.7 points per game against Jarvis at GW will carry over to tonight.

"We've got to get the ball inside, and we've got to rebound better [than we did against Niagara]," Flint said after the game on Monday night. "Lari has always had good games against [teams coached by Jarvis]. That's the one encouraging thing.

"He's had good games against them even with [former GW center Alexander] Koul and other big guys guarding him. So it will be interesting to see what they come out with... if he can play even better than he played tonight, I guess we're going to be alright, then."



Although he will enjoy a favorable size advantage against St. John's, Ketner realizes that Jarvis will likely have something up his sleeve to try and compensate for the difference.

"They're not as big as the players he had at GW, so it's hard to figure out what he's going to do," Ketner said of Jarvis's new front court. "I think he'll trap a lot because they're smaller, and I know that they're going to be a lot more physical than the guys he had at GW.

"I know Mike Jarvis is going to have his guys ready because he knows UMass. We've got to go out there, play hard and rebound."

As far as playing on the road at a hostile Alumni Hall is concerned, Ketner believes that he and his teammates have an easier time focusing on the road. Having played one of the most agressive road schedules in the nation last year, the Philadelphia native doesn't forsee any difficulty in dealing with the boos of the Red Storm fans.

"I like playing on the road better than playing at home anyway," Ketner said. "I don't think it bothers any of us. I think we do well on the road."

Unstoppable Shipp leaves worn defenders in his wake

Massachusetts sophomore tailback assaults school records, leads in rushes

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

The question always comes up.

"Marcel Shipp had a great game today. What can you say about his performance?"

The opposing coach never can quite say. The Massachusetts star running back has forced this uncomfortable situation on the last eight skippers in post- game press conferences after matchups with UMass.

Most coaches squirm for a minute, and then shrug before they blurt out the old stand-by; something like, "Marcel Shipp is a great back, and we knew that coming into the game." That's the easy answer. It keeps the man, who's often still in a state of bewilderment and frustration, from having to get into how he toiled and strategized all week long to find the perfect way to control the All-America candidate, only to have the UMass runner abuse his ingenius alignment for well over 100 yards.

Maine's Jack Cosgrove must have been pretty pleased with himself going into the fourth quarter of this Saturday's game with the Minutemen at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium. Although his Black Bears were already beaten at that point, he had kept Shipp under wraps. 74 yards? Not too bad.

By the time the final quarter ended, though, Shipp had 270 yards, marking the eighth consecutive game in which he finished with triple digits in that category.

"If you play well, everything clicks together," Shipp said, attributing some of his success to the support of his teammates. "The line has been blocking well up front and they've been opening up a lot of things for me and I've been taking advantage of it."

The offensive line has opened up holes for the tailback, but Shipp's own moves get the ball downfield beyond the line of scrimmage. No. 5 has gained a reputation for executing a certain spin move like no other back in the nation, while pulling through several tacklers at a time in an unbelievable fashion that reminds onlookers of Barry Sanders.

"That's just the style of running I've always had; ever since high school and prep school and even now," Shipp explained. "A lot of the things I do are reactions. I don't plan out the runs before I do them."

Shipp is seemingly bestowed with a natural ability to evade tacklers in impossible situations. The UMass star twists and pulls his way down crowded lanes of defenders, leaving a trail of disappointed foes.

These foes not only get a first-hand look at the pieces of sod that Shipp kicks up on his way down the field, but they indirectly get to take part in the methodic destruction of the UMass school record book.

During his 270 yard performance against Maine, Shipp obtained the single season rushing record as only a sophomore. His 1,692 yards with one game remaining, crushed the former record of 1,631 yards by Garry Pearson in 1982.

"I didn't really know how much the record was," Shipp said of the eclipsing of the mark. "I wasn't aware of it until they told me I was closing in on it. It was kind of shocking."

With over 700 yards in his freshman campaign, Shipp nailed down the school mark for first-year players as well, setting a trend that has him breaking the UMass career rushing record roughly half-way through his senior year. The current king of Minutemen, Rene Ingoglia, ended his career as the leading rusher in NCAA Division I-AA history.

"I haven't seen too much tape on [Ingoglia], but I've heard a lot about him, and he's a great back," Shipp said, comparing the all-time Massachusetts leader to himself. "I have seen a couple of tapes of him and it seems like we're opposite style runners, but he is a great back and it would be an honor to break his record."

The man who eventually passed Ingoglia on the NCAA career list, New Hampshire's Jerry Azumah, ends his prolific collegiate reign this year. Azumah, whose dominance over the nation was portrayed quite clearly in his first three annual dismantlings of the Minutemen up through his junior season, grudgingly passed the torch of the premiere Atlantic 10 runner over to Shipp in this year's UMass/UNH matchup, during which the Massachusetts star wrestled the coveted Bill Knight Trophy away from the three-time winner. The award is given to the most valuable player of each year's contest between the two schools, and was given to Shipp after a 185-yard rushing day.

"He's done now, and I just need to keep playing hard (to catch him)," Shipp said of Azumah and his long, awe- inspiring statistic list.

"I'll just keep going and pick (the records) up as I go, I guess. If I keep playing well, I'm sure I'll get the records, although I try not to concentrate on that too much."

Coming into this year, it wasn't certain that the sophomore was going to get the majority of the carries. Last year, several Minutemen got opportunities to tote the ball, including Jamie Holston and Matt Jordan, and with a new coaching staff coming in, nothing was certain.

"At first I wasn't sure I was going to get the ball that much," Shipp said. "Coach (Mark Whipple) proved me wrong, and I've been getting the ball a whole lot."

But he has, and he's been moving the ball a whole lot. This weekend, Shipp and his mates will host Connecticut for the conference title, a game during which No. 5 will see the ball a lot, because Whipple knows that his team will only go as far as "The Shipp" carries them.

Sophomore tailback Marcel Shipp has emerged as one of the most talented runners in all of Division 1-AA this season.

Neely decides to hang them up for good this time out

BOSTON (AP) — Cam Neely hoped to be with the Boston Bruins when they began yesterday's practice. Instead, he sat a few feet away from the rink, ending his comeback attempt.

There were no tears this time, as there were two years ago when the high-scoring power forward announced his retirement at age 31 because of a hip ailment.

Instead, Neely laughed several times at a news conference and said he was satisfied that he had done all he could to try to play again, no matter how long the odds.

Had he not made that effort, he said, "Down the road, I probably would have been asking myself, 'Why didn't you?' That would have been something that I didn't want to deal with."

So, he started physical therapy sessions in March and improved to the point where he began skating with his former team last Wednesday. He did it again Thursday and Saturday but the pain lingered.

His next practice was Monday, but he knew it probably would be his last even though he originally planned to skate for 10 days.

"I toyed with the idea of not even showing up because of how I felt," Neely said. "but I thought that I really had to give this another day."

Later that day, the Bruins announced the comeback attempt had ended.

Satanic cult feared in death of 25

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) — Authorities have discovered the remains of 25 children in a western state capital and fear some were victims of satanic rituals.

The bodies — almost all of them skeletons — were found in two searches in Pereira, a city of 700,000 people about 110 miles from Bogota.

"It's a chilling thing," Mayor Luis Alberto Duque said in a radio interview. "The big concern is we don't know what it's all about."

Twelve of the victims were found Tuesday in a riverbed below a city highway. Searchers repelled down a ravine to reach the site after workers fixing electrical lines spotted what they believed were animal bones, said state prosecutor Elena Osorio.

The other remains were discovered last week, scattered in underbrush in a city lot, after a child came across a skull. Many of the skeletons were incomplete and investigators estimated the number of dead by counting skulls. Forensic experts believe the oldest of the victims was 16 and at least half were 10 or under, Osorio said.

Court hears case for gay marriages

MONTPELIER, Vt. (AP) — Vermont's contention that limiting marriage to heterosexual couples is good for procreation and child-rearing is discriminatory and unconstitutional, a lawyer for three gay couples told the state Supreme Court yesterday.

In a case considered by gay advocates as the best hope for same-sex marriage, Beth Robinson argued that Vermont's 28-year-old ban doesn't serve to protect children.

"If the state's concern is about protecting children, then that would be protected by allowing these couples to marry," she said, noting that two of the three couples have adopted children. State lawyers urged the court to turn down the couples' request to overturn the prohibition. In legal briefs and arguments to the court, they said marriage historically has been defined as a union between a man and a woman because same-sex couples can't biologically bear children.

Cashin Hall suspect arrested on charge of attempted murder

Police have arrested a suspect in connection with the shooting of a University of Massachusetts student in Cashin Residence Hall last month.

Sokha Doe Chhim, 17, of 16 Amherst Crossing, Amherst, was arrested yesterday morning in Springfield and later arraigned at Hampshire District Court in Northampton on charges of attempted murder, assault with a dangerous weapon (a gun) and armed robbery, according to a press release from the Northwestern District Attorney's Office.

UMass Chief of Police John Luippold alleged that the motive for the Oct. 30 shooting was robbery, however he said he was "not in a position to disclose" what the suspect was seeking to rob.

Luippold emphasized that there was a prior relationship between the suspect and the victim.

"This was not a case of random violence, but was an isolated incident where the victim and defendant were acquainted," he said.

The victim, a 24-year-old junior engineering major whose name is being withheld, is in stable condition following surgery for a gunshot wound to the neck.

"In recognizing that two individuals are involved [in the crime], we are concerned for the safety of the victim and we are not releasing his name," Luippold said of their decision to keep the victim anonymous.

Luippold said the incident is still under investigation.

Chhim was ordered by Judge Peter Rutherford to be held without bail pending a Nov. 25 dangerousness hearing, according to a press release. The hearing will determine if Chhim is a threat to the public.

Chhim is currently being held at the House of Corrections, Luippold said.

"I said no"
Rape victim tells story

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: This is the second in a five-part series exploring rape and sexual assault on college campuses. False names are used to preserve anonymity.

Numbers, charts, graphs and percentages are one way to tell the story of rape and sexual assault. But they aren't the only way. The numbers do more than add up, they represent real people and this is one person's story.

"I knew I wasn't wrong. I knew what he did was wrong," said Jane Smith, who was raped by an acquaintance last April, and wants to be anonymous to emphasize that she's like everybody else, a potential victim.

Smith, 22, a University of Massachusetts student, knew she wasn't wrong but she also knows she isn't unusual.

"You don't know who it's going to be. You don't know who it is," Smith said of rape victims. "It's something when it hits you straight on it's just a whole different experience. It's like 'how could this happen to me?'"

Smith was home for Easter when the attack occurred. She knew the assailant and didn't go to the police after the attack. This caused some of her friends to doubt that what had happened was rape.

"I've ended a lot of my friendships. At home, people were not supportive. I had slept with him twice before [and people said] 'it can't be rape, you slept with him.' It doesn't matter. My good friend from UMass was in the next room. (I said) why couldn't you hear me screaming?," Smith said.

Smith said she had been the designated driver that night when her friends went to the bar. Her attacker had been drinking but was sober enough at 8 a.m. to ask if he could "stick it in," to which she replied "no."

Smith said she was "frozen," holding her arms against her chest during the rape. When it was over Smith said he laid his head on her abdomen and said "I'm sorry."

Smith said she then grabbed her clothes and ran from the room.

When she told a friend about what happened Smith was told she was lucky.

"I wasn't beaten. I was held down. My friend said 'it's not that bad. At least you didn't have a knife at your throat,'" Smith said.

Smith made the decision not to go to the police since her friend, who had also been raped, had her name released by a detective without her consent.

"No, I didn't call the cops but that doesn't make it any less of a crime," Smith said.

She said she didn't need a judge to "tell me what he did was wrong."

Smith had her own way of dealing with her attacker.

"I called him three weeks later at 4 in the morning. I figured if I can't sleep why should he?," Smith said. "He didn't know. (I said) didn't I tell you I would not have unprotected sex with you? Didn't I tell you to stop it? Didn't I tell you no?

"He said 'yes I'm sorry. I'm so sorry.'... I scared him shitless. It definitely marked a place in his head."

Seven months after the rape occurred, Smith said confronting her attacker helped her deal with the rape but she is still working to accept that it happened.

"By confronting him and saying 'you're not going to knock me down,' was empowering me to start the process to get back what I lost, but the thing is I'll never retrieve what I lost. I evolved to a whole different person," Smith said.

Smith turned for support to two friends, her acupuncturist and the Dean of Students, but most of her healing she said, she did on her own.

"Basically I was dealing with it with two friends who didn't know each other, and through my head," Smith said. "I was definitely alone a lot of the time."

The effects of the rape appear unexpectedly, Smith said.

"I have good days and bad days," she said. "Halloween I was going to go [to a party] with friends, two of my best friends were going to be there. I think the masks kind of freaked me out. Who's really underneath? You can't distinguish their character. I went to my room and smoked a pack of cigarettes and didn't move," Smith said.

While she feels the rape will always affect her, Smith won't let it stop her.

"I can say I've been raped. I can live with that label," Smith said. "[But] I'm going to continue on with my dreams. There's so many things I want to do in my life."

Victims' pain emotional, and physical

By Julie Fialkow

Survivors of sexual assault go through a range of psychological complications, said Veronica McCullough, a rape crisis counselor for the Young Woman's Christian Association (YWCA) of Western Massachusetts.

"A lot of people I see suffer from a lot of flashbacks and are unable to function on a daily basis because they have to live with this every single day," she said.

According to "Supporting Survivors of Sexual Assault: A Journey to Justice, Health, and Healing," a publication of The Massachusetts Department of Public Health in Collaboration with The Massachusetts Coalition Against Sexual Assault, a wide range of reactions is common for survivors of sexual abuse.

As the survivor moves through a healing process, different reactions may intensify or diminish. These reactions can be: shame, rage, isolation, terror, loss, sadness, powerlessness, flashbacks or nightmares, triggers (seasons, smells, circumstances), changes in sexuality or intimacy, physical concerns such as pregnancy, sexual transmitted diseases, or other injuries, and/or loss of spiritual faith.

McCollough said that both the level of rape-trauma that women experience and the time it takes them to heal can vary.

"I have never seen anyone heal in a week or a month. If they go through a trial it will take even longer because they're retraumatized," she said.

Many women also experience some or all of the stages rape trauma syndrome, a psychological response which can include stages such as disassociation and repression.

Sexual trauma survivors have also been found to have high incidences of eating disorders and abuse of substances like alcohol or drugs.

Campus mourns death of activist Kwame Ture

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

The recent death of legendary civil rights activist and freedom fighter Kwame Ture (formerly Stokely Carmichael) on Monday has shocked people around the world. His loss has been acutely felt and mourned by members of the University of Massachusetts community.

"I went blank and... numb," said Ekweume Michael Thelwell, professor in the W.E.B. Du Bois Afro-American studies department and close friend of Ture.

"I knew very well that his weight was well below 180... that he had been hospitilized 4-5 times in the past week, that he had to be assisted to sit up, and that we had to hastily ship blood to him for transfusions," he said.

"It was clear his cancer had reached a terminal stage. I expected news of his death at any moment [therefore] it did not come as a surprise to me. The surprise was the shock I felt when I heard the news."

He spoke about worldwide memorial services being planned to commemorate Ture's influential life. The African country of Guinea, which once arrested Ture for attempting to overthrow its government, is planning to honor him with a state funeral. The government of Trinidad, which once banned Ture from entering the country, will be sending a delegation to Guinea to honor him.

"People all over the world have responded in an intensity that surprises me," Thelwell said.

This response reflects the stature Ture held in the international black community. He has been regarded as "one of the three most influential civil rights/black liberation leaders of the '60s," along with Dr. Martin Luther King and Malcolm X.

In 1965, he became executive secretary of the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and was well-known for coining the slogan "Black Power." He was considered a controversial militant black activist and was supposedly viewed by the United States government as a national security threat.

In 1967, he went to West Africa and became political secretary to Pan-Africanist Ghanian President Kwame Nkrumah. After Nkrumah's death, he made his home in Guinea at the invitation of President Ahmed Sekou Toure, and changed his name from Stokely Carmichael to Kwame Ture to honor his two mentors. Now, according to Thelwell, Ture may be honored by sharing a burial place with his mentors at the Mausaleum of the Martyrs.

In 1996, Ture was diagnosed with prostate cancer, and made frequent visits to the United States to receive treatment. At the end of one of these visits, in April of 1997, he delivered a memorable speech at UMass.

Thelwell met Ture as a freshman at Howard University. They were fellow civil rights activists in SNCC, and had been recently working closely together on Ture's autobiographical memoirs.

"He has worked very hard on the memoirs," Thelwell said. "He left us with a massive amount of material. It is his own reflection on his life and struggle, and will be an important addition to the historical record."

UM employee cited in collision with pedestrian

The driver of the car that hit a University of Massachusetts student last Wednesday has been issued a citation for the incident.

University employee Apollos Ihedigbo, 52, of Amherst, struck Kerry Hines on Infirmary Way in front of Hills House on Nov. 11, police said.

Hines, 25, a senior biology major, remains in critical condition at Baystate Medical Center.

UMass Chief of Police John Luippold said in a press release that the citation was issued for "operating negligently as to endanger the lives and safety of the public."

The citation was issued after UMass police and the state police investigated the accident, reconstructed the scene and consulted with the district attorney's office, Luippold said.

Board of Higher Ed. anticipates tuition decrease next year

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Board of Higher Education (BHE) met yesterday at Greenfield Community College, approving a fiscal year 2000 budget request, which recommended a general appropriations funding total of approximately $478 million, a 7.7 percent increase from last year's recommendations.

According to the budget request, the Board of Higher Education "anticipates a 5 percent decrease in tuition at the University and recommends that student fees be reduced by 2 percent." It also states that the loss of tuition from these recommended decreases in resident tuition will be made up by an increase in non-resident tuition.

By the year 2002, students... at the University of Massachusetts will pay no more than 33 percent... of the cost of their education," said board member Tamara Davis.

According to Davis, this "system-wide financing framework" will promote access to higher education and performance accountability, enhance financial aid relative to student need and increase overall state support for higher education.

She briefly commented on the issue of exit exams for University students in an interview after the meeting. According to Davis, the Board will be presenting a report in January outlining "specific performance measures in terms of how to evaluate how a college is performing."

The Board also unanimously passed a request for board action concerning an incentive program for aspiring teachers. The program allows the Board to award up to $500,000 per year in non-need-based tuition waivers to approximately 150 students who commit to teaching for two years in a public school in the Commonwealth.

At one point in the meeting, an audience member remarked at the work being accomplished.

"This is just terrific... all this productivity... everyone should be proud of themselves."

But not everyone attending yesterday's meeting was impressed with the Board's recent performance. Protesters from the Massachusetts State College Association (MSCA) and the Association of Professors and Administrators (APA) picketed outside the meeting at Greenfield Community College yesterday morning. They were upset because of the failure of the board to "settle a fair and equitable collective bargaining agreement" with faculty and librarians across the state.

"Meeting at the bargaining table with BHE representatives for nine months has been a waste of time," read a MSCA handout. "They tell us that if we give in, then we'll get some kind of a raise — but at the same time, their economic offer to us is three years of zero percent raise."

Brad Art, bargaining chair of the MSCA and teacher of ethics at Westfield College, openly challenged the contract negotiation process and the Board's recent proposal to offer a three year renewable contract system with an increased salary as an alternative to the traditional tenure contract system.

"I think what you're doing is wrong," Art said. "Massachusetts has the lowest paid faculty members among the industrialized states. You're not acting properly for the faculty and students of the state."

"We've never suggested abolishing tenure," countered James Carlin, chairman of the board.

Carlin also responded to the protester's claims in an interview after the meeting.

"Nothing we're proposing is earth-shaking," he said. "All you have to do in Massachusetts is stay around for seven years and have a pulse and you get tenure. It's not a selective process."

Survivors of Sexual Assault: A Journey to Justice, Health, and Healing," survivors often use food as a method of controlling their lives (rigidly regulating their food take or planing secret rituals of binging and purging), as a comfort or numbing mechanism, or self- punishment.

Substance abuse is common, according to the book, because while intoxicated or high, memories of traumatic events can be blocked out and feelings numbed. Survivors who are victimized by family members are particularly at risk for substance abuse.

Religious diversity highlights talk

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Correspondent

Last night the University of Massachusetts Inter-Religious Project (IRP) presented a panel discussion marking the beginning of the the IRP's second year of sponsoring dialogues between members of different faiths.

The on-campus panel discussion was entitled "It Was Real For Me: Perspectives on Spiritual Experience."

Five panelists: UMass senior Sonia Ali, a Muslim; Ron Welburn, an associate English professor with a background in Native American spirituality; Clint Hardesty, a chaplain with the Campus Crusade for Christ; Dr. Edward Bruce Bynum, the director of behavioral medicine at UMass Health Services; and Tony Baptiste, a UMass senior with a background in social work, engaged in a discussion about their various spiritual experiences, and the effects these experiences had on their lives.

After giving brief introductions, each panelist responded to questions from the audience. The discussion was moderated by William Johnston, a professor in the history department, and Erica Stengel, a UMass junior.

The five panelists, while all from different religious backgrounds, agreed on several main points.

All stated that spiritual experiences did not need to be spontaneous in order to be significant, and that the repetition of these experiences reaffirms their faith rather than demystifying it.

Baptiste told the audience that he discovered his spirituality during a period of meditation, and that the best way to explain religion to a non-believer is to "think of a void, and how nothingness turns to nature."

When asked if they feel that during spiritual experiences the mind is separate from the body, most of the panelists said they did not.

Welburn said that in Native American cultures, the body is very important because one must have "knowledge of the body" to be aware of themselves spiritually. Likewise, Ali said that she feels she needs to feel "conscious" of her experiences in order to fully realize them.

Bynum discussed the psychological aspects of these religious experiences. He said that while many psychologists dismiss religious beliefs as "fantasy," most mental health experts now recognize that many people who describe these experiences are undergoing religious transformations, rather than suffering delusional episodes.

He stressed that spirituality and science are not incompatible, and that they are in fact connected. He said that the difference between a delusional experience and a spiritual one is that "while both are in the ocean, one is swimming while the other is drowning."

The IRP is sponsored by a group of religious leaders from varying backgrounds, including Christianity, Muslim, Judaism and Baha'i. Last year it conducted five dialogues within UMass, in which different subjects were discussed. Johnston called last night's meeting a "sequel" to last year's seminars.

Johnston ended the discussion with a Native American quote: "The greatest gift you can give another is not discourse, but to listen to the other, and to report accurately what the other has said."

Pruddy's owner denies charges

By Rachel Uranga
Collegian Staff

In the past two weeks, the town of Amherst, along with state agencies, have taken a series of actions that could ultimately shut down Pruddy's.

Last Friday, Amherst police along with the Alcohol Beverages Control Commissions swept Pruddy's, in an early morning raid. They arrested Prudencio Gomez Sr. for disturbing the peace and resisting arrest. Gomez who pleaded not guilty will stand a pre-trial hearing in Hampshire District Court on Jan. 8.

ABCC supervising investigator, Jim Staples said the agency plans on filing a criminal complaint against Gomez Sr., license holder of Pruddy's, this week charging him with illegal storage and sale of alcohol and keeping a common nuisance.

Last week, Town Manager Barry Del Castilho told the Daily Hampshire Gazette, Amherst will seek a court injunction, forcing Pruddy's to close by 1 a.m.

"We've been constantly fighting. We have had legal fees for three years. The cops have visited our place more than 30 times," said Gomez, who along with his attorney believe that the raids are an effort, partly racially motivated, by police and local Amherst officials to shut down Pruddy's.

In July, Pruddy's lost its liquor license. The Amherst Select Board, in a series of meetings, found Pruddy's permitted minors to possess alcohol.

The select board issues liquor license with ABCC's approval. The board can hold hearings to revoke these licenses, based on recommendations from the police. ABCC or on their own initiative.

In the case of Pruddy's, the police delivered a report to the board, which resulted in the restaurant losing its alcohol permit.

Since then Pruddy's, which has been operating on an expired restaurant permit, has been staying open from 11 p.m. to 3 a.m., allowing patrons to bring their own alcohol.

"[Prudencio Gomez Jr.] consistently tried to avoid obeying the law. It was one incident after another," Homer W. Cowles said.

Cowles said Joanne Delong's accusations were "completely incorrect." He recalls three prior liquor violations prior to Pruddy's license being revoked.

Delong, Gomez's attorney, said her client has been singled out. "The town has not held them [other bars] to the same standards." Delong said.

Several other bars in the area have had similar problems but there were no attempts to confiscate their alcohol permit, she said.

Donald Maia, Amherst's chief of police, said he does "not recall" having problems with alcohol violations at other bars or restaurants this summer. Maia said he issued the recommendation out of a concern for public safety. Before alcohol violations are issued, managers are usually warned, he said. Pruddy's, which is across the street from the police station, "is flaunting the law. There's a right way to run business and there's a wrong way to run business," Maia said.

"The only problem with Mr. Gomez is that his last name is Gomez. There's no other way to explain their [the select board's] actions" Gomez's attorney said.

Gomez says he will stay open as long as he can.

"The lifeblood of all restaurants in town is the liquor license. We are not making any profits cause we are not selling alcohol. A lot of people tell us why don't we give up. We're not making any money. We won't, it's a matter of principal," Gomez said.

Gomez said the police officers are there nightly to "harass our customers." He believes the officials maintain vigil, in hopes of shutting his establishment down. "I don't serve liquor. It would be stupid to break the law because we know they are looking at us."

Maia does not dem officers continual presence at the bar. "It's a public safety concern."

Prior to Pruddy's losing its license, Cowles said, "Officers on the street say it was common knowledge that if an underage girl wants to drink they can go to Pruddy's."

Gomez denies these charges.

"This is a family business my brother and sister work there. My father helps me out. My friends, my mother and family member are helping me out."

Because of their help, Gomez says he can stay open, but he says "it's frustrating. Any dollar I don't make, we're losing."

Tobacco settlement still on table

Ohio, Idaho among 16 states that say they will sign deal

By Skip Wollenberg
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Ohio and Idaho joined 14 other states that say they will sign the $206 billion tobacco settlement while attorneys general who have yet to decide conferred by telephone yesterday about the massive proposal.

The states have until midday tomorrow to say whether they will sign the settlement that was aimed at resolving all remaining state claims against tobacco companies for the costs of health care for sick smokers.

While most states are expected to sign, it is unclear how many will be needed for the cigarette makers to proceed with the deal. The tobacco companies have said they need a "sufficient" number of states to sign, but declined to elaborate.

The nation's four biggest tobacco makers agreed to make the payments over 25 years, beginning in 2000, in exchange for escaping a huge legal and financial threat to the industry. The money would go to the 46 states that have not already reached individual settlements with the industry as well as for research on why children start smoking and programs to discourage smoking. Four states have already reached settlements worth a combined $40 billion.

Ohio Attorney General Betty Montgomery announced yesterday the state would sign the settlement which offers the state $9.9 billion over 25 years.

"Clearly this is the right thing to do for the people of Ohio, who will benefit from this agreement for decades," she said. Idaho officials also announced they would sign the settlement that is expected to bring the state about $712 million through 2025.

Attorney General Al Lance and Gov. Phil Batt said the agreement met all the objectives of the state's lawsuit, including prohibiting efforts to get children to start smoking and misrepresentation about tobacco's health risks.

SGA asks faculty senate to delay honors college vote for discussion

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

A motion was passed at last night's University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) senate meeting asking the faculty senate, which meets tomorrow, to allow two weeks before deciding on the proposal for the new Commonwealth College honors program.

Senator Seth Diamond (commuter area) wrote the motion, which called for more student input in the proposal detailing plans for the $21 million-dollar Commonwealth College to be built in Orchard Hill residential area.

Bron Tamulis, secretary of public policy and relations, spoke before the senate on Diamond's behalf. He said there have been a lot of new changes to the honors program which have not been brought forth to the SGA.

"There is a lot of vague language and uncertain things. The best thing is just to delay the process time to inform students about the changes," said Tamulis.

One example of one initiative in the proposal which Tamulis feels students should be made aware of before it's passed, involves students in the Commonwealth College having preferences in housing assignments.

"The initiative would allow, for example, five students who lived together in their freshman year in the honors program wanted to all live together in Sylvan, they would be moved together. Two students living in a suite their already, could be moved out," he said.

Senator Mikale Billard (commuter area), who is chairman of the Administrative Affairs committee and also serves on a administrative committee looking at the Commonwealth College, said plenty of time had passed in which students could have voiced their concerns to him about problems in the proposal.

"They could have told me what's wrong and we could have fixed it. In the past three meetings [Commonwealth College meetings] we have discussed things," he said. "This could have been done along time ago, not a day before the faculty senate meeting."

Although many senators left the meeting before the motion was voted on, quorum was barely made and the motion passed.

Speaker of the Senate Jodi Bailey expressed concern at the lack of senators still remaining at the meeting.

"To leave before a vote is not taking being a representative of the student body seriously," she said.

Other motions passed were to give $1,000 to Orchard Hill Area government for a new copy machine, appointing members to the Campus Center Student Union Commission, and appointing new senators Dan Backer (commuter area), Josh Menke (Van Meter), and Michael DiRico (Washington).

Having a ball

Testicles: these don't usually come to mind when someone mentions Thanksgiving. The thought of Thanksgiving makes most people think of family, turkey and football. There is nothing about the holiday that remotely refers to testicles, for the vast majority of Americans. However, one of my fondest Thanksgiving memories has to do with testicles. Or the lack thereof.

Let me take a moment to tell you what the rest of this column will entail. It is a true story about a lie I told on Thanksgiving day 1997 and the few surrounding days. For the purpose of this column I have changed the guy's name to Ricky Babylonybus. It was by some stroke of dumb luck that I decided to make up the following rather gruesome story about him and to tell a few people at the Thanksgiving Day football game. The story then spread like wildfire through my suburban Massachusetts town.

Dan Viens

For the remainder of this story please pretend that you are from my hometown. You have known Ricky for a few years, but haven't really seen him lately. Pretend that either I or someone you know is telling you this story.

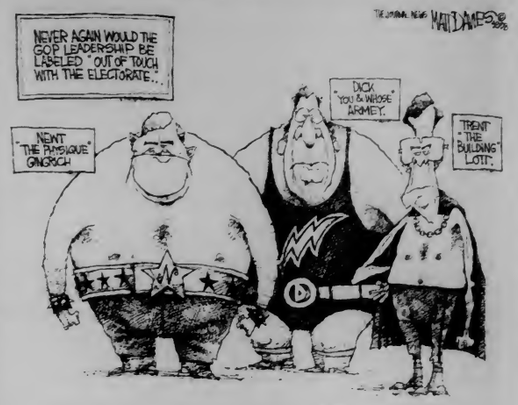
Hey, do you know Ricky Babylonybus? Did you hear what happened to him? Well I was talking to my mom the other day and she saw Mr. Babylonybus in the frozen food aisle of Big Y. My mom then asked how Ricky was doing. At first Mr. Babylonybus was reluctant to answer. Then he remembered that my mom was a nurse and figured that he could ask her opinion. My mother said that she would help if she possibly could.

Mr. Babylonybus told my mom that Ricky was a freshman in college and that he was living in the dorms. One day, just like any other day, Ricky went up one floor to take a shower. After he took his shower he came back down to his floor. Ricky was walking back to his room wearing nothing but his boxer shorts. His friend came out of his room and got down in a three-point stance like a football offensive linemen. Ricky did the same thing. They both started running at each other at top speed like football players. All of a sudden Ricky realized that they were actually going to crash into one another.

At the last possible second Ricky jumped out of the way. In doing this he turned toward and kind of smacked one of the doors in the hallway. The next thing Ricky knew was he was lying on the ground writhing in pain. His boxer shorts were soaked in blood. Ricky kept screaming "Oh my God. Oh my God!"

When Ricky jumped out of the way he had turned the front of his body towards the door. Only a few minutes before this happened, the girl who lives in that room had removed a shirt drying on the doorknob. She forgot to take the hanger off the knob. When Ricky turned against the door he caught his scrotum and right testicle on the coat hanger. You can imagine what a wire hanger at high speeds would do. The doctors stitched Ricky up, but they were only able to salvage his left testicle.

Mr. Babylonybus told my mother this whole story in hopes that she would have some knowledge on nudicle surgery. Nudicles are fake testicles that can be inserted to reduce the self consciousness that someone with one or no testicles may feel. My mother told Mr. Babylonybus that the procedure was rather pricey, but for a young man of Ricky's age having only one testicle could prove to be a severe detriment to his self esteem.



So there it is. I told that story to a bunch of kids from my hometown. At least 90 percent of the people I told believed me. Although it is quite outrageous, I made it believable. Telling people that I heard the story from my mom makes it seem that I have a reliable source. Also the ridiculous amount of detail makes this story seem real. For instance my mother and Mr. Babylonybus supposedly had this conversation in the frozen food aisle at Big Y.

The big problem was that the people I told, told other people and those people told more people. Before I knew it the story had grown to become an entity all its own. The story started spreading around the high school of my town from which I was two years removed at the time. The story began turning up at dinner tables all over my town. I don't know how, but parents were finding out about this terrible story and they wanted to know from their kids if it was true.

The worst part (or best part, depending) is that since it is such a sensitive issue Ricky's own best friends weren't even sure if they should ask him about it. They figured that the reason they hadn't heard was that Ricky was so ashamed.

Eventually the story got back to Ricky. Needless to say he was not very happy. He sent out a mass e-mail to kids from our town proclaiming that there was no truth to his tragic story. Alas, for the first time in my life I had sent the rumor mill a spinning. I wasn't proud of it, but by the time I got around to feeling guilty I had myself convinced that Ricky really was the one-nut wonder that everyone thought he was.

Let's celebrate!

Okay, so I'm a pessimist, I'll admit to that. I tend to look at the downside of things, and you might even say I complain a lot. My friend "Socks" told me that I should write something positive and optimistic for my next editorial, and you know what? She was right! Instead of complaining about everything on campus I should be happy and easy-going.

In lieu of this recent revelation, I wish to share my enthusiasm with everyone. Let's celebrate! And I don't mean just for this moment. I'm talking about throughout the year, every year.

Everyone loves holidays to relax, consume thousands of calories at festive meals and to express how "thankful" they are for what they have. But there are many months during the year that have no such holidays. No declared days to let your hair down, stay home from work or school, and get inebriated with your family — but I have a solution!

To dispense some of my newly-found optimism and endorphin rush, I am officially declaring certain "holiday time frames" throughout the year to narrow holidays in order to show my gratitude and thanks to those groups on campus that have given us all so much joy and exhilaration.

February doesn't have any holidays (look, when you've been single as long as I have, Valentine's Day isn't a holiday, okay?). So, in honor of all of the illegal backpack checks, the annoyed "legal" students that have been carded because they carried alcohol from the parking lot, and the speeding tickets for going five miles per hour over the limit, I hereby declare Feb. 19 to be "Recognition of Uniformed Law Enforcers Day" (RULE day).

To celebrate RULE day, buy all the doughnuts you can find and donate them to your favorite COP (corrupter of people). You know, the one that gave you the jaywalking ticket last week for no reason other than that it was the end of the month and his quota wasn't met. I'm sure he'll really appreciate it.

Our next commemoration of euphoria will be in March, when we will be thankful for all of the students who lived in a hotel or were off-campus but were charged for a dorm. Yes, we will feel warm inside when we remember the busy signals and dead ends at our Housing Assignment Office (HAO). On March 25, we will celebrate "Housing Employees Looking Out for the Public Day" (HELP day).

Celebrate this day by saying, "thank you" to the office for putting you in Sylvan when you wanted Southwest and for charging you over a thousand dollars for a room you never were in. Oh, come on... break down and give them a hug. You know you'll feel better.

To celebrate the month of August, our fiesta will be in honor of one of the most outspoken groups on campus, the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO). Yes, on the 14th, we shall remind ourselves of all the sidewalk chalk marring the Whitmore building, the picket signs stating, "Amass my ass" the arrogant attitudes and the ever-so orgasmic rallies held in front of the Student Union. We shall celebrate "Accomplishments of Graduate Employee Dedication Day" (AGED day).

In five years, we'll remember how difficult it was to enter the building with those narcissistic, intemperate baby-boomer wannabes blocking the entrance, and we'll say, "Boy, those were the days."

The next thing on our list of pleasures is going to occur on July 5 (so you can recover from the 4th). Here, we become nostalgic and joyful as we recall all of those times that we got smacked with parking tickets because all of the spaces in the lot we paid for were full.

July 5 will be "Celebration for Officials of Parking Services Day" ("COPS day). We'll smile when we remember the times the woman "of generous proportions" gave you a $50 ticket for parking in a space for 14 minutes when the sign said you were allowed 15. We'll reminisce about Big Bertha drooling as she saw a car parked in the red lot without a permit. On this day, show you care by saying thanks as you see "Tiny" sticking the yellow envelope onto your windshield. Perhaps we should deliberately park in an illegal spot... just to see her smile.

Our final holiday will be quite different than the rest. On this day, all people will be content, no one will complain, everyone will "love thy neighbor," all countries will be at peace, and "we'll all just get along."

Of course, there can only be one day on the calendar for this radical day. February 29. We'll call it "Brotherly Love Internationally Subduing Saddam Day" (BLISS day). Though we all hope for the return of the hippy attitude to some degree, our 90's society could never handle a serene world more than once every four years. This holiday would best be celebrated during leap year because it would take just as much training and preparation as the Olympic games for it to ever occur.

Okay, so perhaps I'm being unrealistic. Perhaps the police will never really enforce just "rules" and maybe the HAO will never "help" anyone at all. GEO may never act like "aged," mature adults, and parking services will never be seen as "cops" (despite what they think). And I'm sure the world will never experience peace and "bliss" as long as the sinister Saddam Hussein and idiots like him are around.

Oh well, I guess I was never cut out for optimism. Optimists are usually disappointed (but happy) and pessimists are usually satisfied (but bitter), and I just can't seem to balance the two. I'm sorry. "Socks."

Oh well, until I do, I'll keep "speaking my mind," look at my calendar, and celebrate those holidays etched in stone. Auntie's cooking Thanksgiving dinner this year, anyway, so it should be fun.

Do the right thing

A scene from Godard's film Vivre sa vie goes something like this: a man in a French cafe asks a woman if her stunning friend (played by Anna Karenina) is a "lady, or is she a whore." When his question is neatly sidestepped (for she is, indeed, a prostitute) he says he has his own way of finding out. He claims that the way she reacts when he says rude, presumptuous things to her will reveal the truth. "If she's a whore, she'll get mad. If she is a lady, she will laugh."

Films, books, and men's magazines are loaded with similar ways to test a woman by placing her in some artificial situation. Few people could forget A Bronx Tale, which contains examples of at least two such "classic" tests. One character advocates "pushing her head into your lap" and pulling up next to a trucker on the highway, in his line of sight, and seeing if she resists. If she does, she's a "good girl" — if not, she's again, a "whore." Another man in the film swears by the old "does she unlock your car door from the inside" tack.

Such arbitrary methods of summing up a woman's worth may raise some eyebrows, as they should. It is certainly impossible to put a woman into a category based only on one encounter, and "testing" is, of course, rather silly. Immature men dabble in such things when they would do better to watch how a woman reacts to an actual situation — one of life's tests.

I am referring to one action at one particular moment that defines whether a woman is a real lady, or something less. After all, a lady is not defined by the fact that she laughs at rudeness toward her, by her sexual propriety, or by her habit of unlocking a car door. Her laughter might indicate that she is accustomed to being treated well, and cannot imagine someone being seriously rude to her. Her sexual restraint in the car still does not make her a lady, either. As for unlocking a car door — it proves nothing except that she has some awareness of other peoples' needs.

No, a real lady has strength of character and a conscience that compels her to do the right thing, not opt for the easy way out. Like a gentleman, she has honor. This past week, one girl in particular found herself in a real-life test. In Burlington, Wisconsin, on Sunday of this week, she averted a crisis. Five boys, all 15 or 16 years old, were arrested for a plan that could have taken the lives of their high school principal, the assistant principal, a teacher, a police officer stationed in the school and possibly as many as 20 students.

The boys, a loose group of friends who kept to themselves, were considered "goths," because they wore black and listened to Marilyn Manson. Vikki Hatch, a self-described friend of the five boys, said they were known as "the freaks" and "the Satan worshipers," although she claimed the teenagers were not believed to be heavily into Satanic rituals.

Tanya Mannes

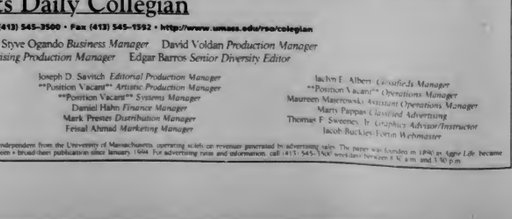
They were teased by the other high school cliques, one known as the "preps" and the other known as the "hicks." Gary Large, the assistant police chief, seemed puzzled at the lack of motivation. "When we tried to pressure them further on that, they said, 'No, we just didn't like them.' Why didn't you like them? 'It's because they picked on us, because they made fun of us in the past, and therefore we've targeted them.'"

Their elaborate plot came close to fruition. They described it as a "suicide mission," assuming that they would get caught and jailed, or killed. The, planned to go into the principal's office, hold him hostage at gunpoint, and force him to instruct the teachers over the loudspeaker, to keep all students inside the classrooms. Then the boys planned to get the class schedules for those on their hit list, bring them to the office, and shoot them all.

The article in Tuesday's New York Times makes no mention of anyone else informing authorities about the criminal plot, only "a girlfriend of one of the teenagers (who) told her parents, who called the police." Out of the entire clique, she was the only one who had the courage to tell her parents.

Here was a girl who was no doubt taunted, like her boyfriend, by their insensitive classmates. She may have felt very alone except for her friends, the "freaks." Sometimes, if we look back to our adolescence, we remember high school as a world of its own, with its own harsh social rules — and penalties. It's not easy for many students to look beyond high school, to a time when nobody will tease them because they are different.

Imagine her inner conflict — do I tell and risk losing my friends and boyfriend? Am I being a baby? Do I really care what happens to these kids who have made my life miserable? And anyway, will they really go through with it?



What shows the true character, the essence of a woman? Some people would say things like sophomoric tests. But we know better. Cheers to the unsung girl who blew the whistle in Wisconsin this week, who saved her classmates and teacher from her boyfriend and his friends, putting aside her misgivings and setting herself up for ridicule if she was wrong.

She could have stayed at home "sick" from school that day, and by an act of omission, allowed events to go unchecked. But instead, she risked being an outcast in her social circle. She betrayed her boyfriend. She knew that once her parents knew what was planned, she could not pretend she wasn't involved.

Unlike every other teenager in her group of friends, this girl put aside her own fear, in favor of doing the right thing. Not much is being said about this girl, but by passing this absolutely valid, real-life test of character, she has shown herself to be a true lady.

Fashion Advice For The Male Shopper

Jacob Fanning

5-02 Fashion advice for the male shopper

Love it or hate it, winter is here and in terms of fashion, it's often the season of our discontent. Out with the light khakis and snug white T-shirt and in with the frumpy sweaters that just ooze sex appeal (just kidding, of course). I mean let's face it, it's tough to look chic when you're freezing your assets off. In the process we end up sacrificing style for comfort and wind up looking like I do today. Namely, a mess! I call it my celebrity gear (you intentionally look like crap in an attempt not to be noticed).

Anyway, one doesn't necessarily have to come at the expense of the other. Here's a few ideas on how to keep you looking hot regardless of how cold it is outside.

It's hard for us guys to find a little variety in our attire. There's only so much you can do with a simple pant and shirt combo. Oh, one shirt's got a stripe on it, the other doesn't. Big whoop! Banana Republic, however, has released its winter line-up and man, is it to die for.

It caters to the gentleman in us all, who are looking for a slightly more refined, more distinguished look. Sure it's a wee bit expensive, but if you shop around and exhibit a little patience (a quality I seem to lack) you can actually find some decent deals. Here's just a sample of what I love about Banana:

• The store has just unleashed a collection of cashmere sweaters (for both his and her pleasure) that is simply yummy. And, "No!" it's not, pardon the expression, "flaming" or overtly feminine, especially if you stick with dark colors or earth tones. As far as colors go, "less is more." There's no need to be looking like a "Glow-stick" in the middle of December.

• As for pants, khakis are still a viable option, as are cargo pants and jeans. For khakis I'd suggest checking out Banana Republic or the Gap. In terms of quality and affordability, they're probably your best bet. Just please, for the love of God, stop with the wide load pants. That's one trend I just don't get, I mean, it can't be to score originality points because guess what, everyone else is wearing them too. Oh well, like I've said before, everyone's entitled to their own opinion.

• Let's turn to jackets. I love the plushy ski jackets of yesterday but may I suggest a snazzy alternative. My friends and I were all discussing this last night and we all agree that nothing looks sexier on a man than leather or suede. For leather jackets I'd go with black and for suede I'd try a nice dark brown.

They sometimes lack that extra insulation but if you dress accordingly, you won't need it. I've also seen a few guys on campus sporting a dark, (usually blue or black) double-breasted coat that looks very chic. It's very DKNY. J Crew offers one made from Italian wool and nylon for a cool $168, which in my opinion is a steal. I spent over $200 on my stupid ski jacket and how often do I actually go skiing? It comes in navy, charcoal heather or black. Personally, I'd go with the charcoal heather coat. It's much more versatile than the others.

• Structure (love it!) offers a heavy, long sleeve shirt that boasts a unique blend of spandex and cotton. It's very flattering on those of you who have a terrific bod. More importantly, it's warm too. Honey, if you got it, flaunt it. The price is pretty reasonable too. Last time I checked they were practically giving them away ($20).

Other do's and don'ts:

Do's:

• Channel rib and waffle sweaters. J Crew offers some for as low as $38.

• Stone washed, cotton, twill khakis. They're warm, soft and look great.

• Dress shoes. Toss those crummy sneakers aside and go out and buy yourself a nice pair of Doc Martins.

Don'ts:

• Turtlenecks. I've yet to see a guy who can successfully pull off a turtleneck. I'd especially advise against it if you have a long, skinny neck. A turtleneck will only have the effect of making your neck look even more elongated.

You'd be much better off wearing a nice scarf. I'd suggest something in a gray or black. They look great when paired with a leather jacket. Go ahead and splurge on a nice one, too.

• I'm not a huge fan of sweatshirts with hoods. They're a bit passe in my opinion.

Last but not least, we need to discuss accessories. Sometimes it's the little things that make the man. Hell, my friend Ernie has a hat for every occa-

Heating It Up With Female Fashion

Cynthia Santostuosso

Hey ladies, this winter, fashion isn't just about bundling up in your woolies to keep warm. It's about looking great! You can still look positively gorgeous and keep nice and toasty all at once.

Outerwear is most important for warmth during this frosty season, but it's the accessories that can make the outfit complete. This season has some of the best hats I have ever seen. I'm talking about funky patterns, soft fuzzy materials and the funnest part of all — pompoms!

Faces has an awesome selection, including some crazy animal prints and rainbow striped jobs. They have any kind you can dream of. Details also has quite a few cute numbers, but they're a little pricey. If hats aren't your thang, then try one of the fuzzy fleece headbands to prevent your ears from getting frostbite.

The next issue to deal with is the dilemma of wearing mittens or gloves. I personally am a fan of mittens because they keep your fingers much warmer (I think it's got something to do with the body heat passing between your fingers. Can you tell I'm an English major?). There's always great wool mittens in the Campus Center, ya know where they sell those bulky sweaters and other hippie stuff? You can probably score a pair for a quick five bucks. If you're into gloves, try a cute chenille pair, they're surprisingly warm and ultra stylish this season.

So, you're keeping warm now, but what are you going to wear underneath? Twin sweater sets are still big this year and they're incredibly versatile. You can layer the tank and cardigan with other pieces of clothing too. They can be dressed down with jeans, khakis or cords. Or you can dress them up with a slinky little skirt.

Skirts are getting dangerously short this season, which feels just great in sub-zero degree weather, so make sure to wear them when you know you'll be inside for a long time. Also, a requirement for skirts this season is slits. They can be little, to show just a hint of leg, or you can go all the way baby and show it all!

Sweaters this season are ultra-soft in knits, chenilles, mohairs and wool blends. There are lots of adorable patterns on sweaters, especially at Express and Abercrombie. Anything with snowflakes is super cute and sooo festive for the holidays. You can try layering these sweaters with a fitted cotton blend, collared shirt to gain that slightly preppy look. The shirt also looks great on its own, especially with some tight black or grey pants.

If you have to dress up, let's say for a little

Year's shin-dig, then you're going to have fun lots of fun shopping. It's all about shining and shimmering this year and into the next. Rich velvet tones and silky satins are big for dresses, pants, and shirts. Anything with beads and sparkles is a must-have this season. The look you're trying to achieve is kind of like combining Lolita with a fairy princess. Dangerously sexy, but soft and pretty.

Accessories can absolutely not be overlooked this season, they are way to nice to pass up. Chokers are back in, but have been updated from those cheezy early 90's ones we all know, but don't like to admit, we wore. Thin rhinestone bands and gems are now the rage, rather than those thick tacky ones, or God forbid, those horrible studded dog collars.

Maybe you're one of those people who hates bugs as much as me, or you could be a fan of those revolting little insects. In any case, there's an adorable line of jewelry and hair clips out there that actually makes those little pests seem friendly. Butterflies, dragonflies and ladybugs are buzzin' around almost every store right now. But make sure to only wear one piece of jewelry at a time, because there's something rather unappealing about being covered in bugs.

Makeup this season is quite dramatic. You can definitely pull it off at some glitzy holiday party. Shimmery silvers are beautiful on blue eyes, while deep golds and bronzes are nice on brown and green eyes. Try to keep those same undertones in lip colors. Burgundies are also really popular, especially on lips. Don't forget to apply glitter to your eyes to really make them glow. And don't skip the scents this winter. It's easy to do, just keep moisturized with some lovely scented lotions. Check out Bath & Body for their new Sugar Plum line.

Winter Fashion Do's & Don'ts:

Do's:

• Make it shine girls! Bring out those sparkles for those special nights out.

• Keep your skin protected with funky hats, mittens and scarves.

• Make sure to have some good stylin' boots. Don't even attempt to walk in heels during an ice storm, hello, use some common sense.

Don'ts:

• Avoid those wretched brightly colored, long puffy jackets with hoods. Ya know the kind your mom used to wear in the 80s? Please, avoid them like the plague.

• Earmuffs. They were cute when you were a 7-year-old, but alas, you're an adult now.

So ladies, keep warm this winter. Remember you can look gorgeous even during a blizzard!

Love Movement rolls into Mullins this Monday

A Tribe Called Quest invades the Mullins Center this Monday night.

By Laura Forster
Collegian Staff

Always looking to do something a lil' new, and a lil' different, Tribe Called Quest will be showing their latest off in concert this Monday night at the William D. Mullins Center at 8 p.m.

With their latest album, The Love Movement, recently released, the group has brought out their fresh ideas on the age old theme of love and relationships.

ATCQ member, Ali Shaheed Muhammad described the album as "...a sonic and spiritual revolution on wax that manages to break new ground without ever losing its sense of playfulness."

As usual, the group manages to mix up an album doing things to hip hop never known before. "Common Ground (Get It Goin' On)" is one song to listen up for as a background kazoo adds a genius twist to lyrics about trying to make a relationship work without trying to change the person you are with.

The Love Movement is Ali, Q-Tip and Phife-Dog's take on love in its various forms as it affects most people, but forget any fear of the group getting soft on their fifth album, instead they aim to keep it real.

"We go through things dealing with relationships that everyone else goes through," says Ali, and the group captures all the essences of love, including "For Moms," dedicated to their mothers, featuring Spanky.

One of the most impressive songs on the album is "Find a Way," which talks about being in love with a girl you're friends with. As Q-Tip explains — "When you're younger, if one girl doesn't work out, you're on to the next one. But as you get older you feel like you could really be with somebody."

Although The Love Movement doesn't have as much of the full feminine background which has been working for ATCQ's past albums so well, combinations with Busta Rhymes, Redman and Noreaga still bring some meant-to-be mixes.

Monday night's concert, the group's largest venue on their tour, has a lot to offer up with a fresh album under their belt and four others, all which have gone gold or platinum, to pull from.

Slum Village will be opening the show on Monday night, with doors opening at 7 p.m. Tickets are $20 for UMass students and are only available at the Mullins Center Box Office, otherwise tickets are $22.50 in advance at all TicketMaster locations.

Multi-talented Hardin's debut CD

ANNA FEDER / COLLEGIAN

John Hardin is a one-man band and a native of Williamsburg.

The album explains that Hallucigenia Sparsa is the Latin name assigned to a long extinct species of sea creature whose fossilized remains bear so little resemblance to any living species that it remains unclassifiable.

What does the title of the band (and this debut album) have to do with the music? The producer, Williamsburg resident John Hardin, explains that he happened upon a fossil of one of these creatures at the Smithsonian Natural History Museum in Washington, D.C.

"The idea of a strange organism that is different from any other organism" is an idea embodied by his music. He also admits that the connections to hallucinations and hallucinogens are important to the experience of his songs which he if pressed characterizes as ambient.

"I like the idea that music can fill a role as an environment, not something that you focus on but that creates an atmosphere," he said.

Unlike most ambient music, much of the music, which is created by Hardin alone, is surprisingly created by electric guitar. He points out that he's "interested in making strange guitar noises." There are also a few contributions from an acoustic drum, a drum machine and a synthesizer.

In addition to his musical career Hardin is also a video- maker and social activist with the Citizens Awareness Network, a pro-active group that is working to shut down the nuclear power plants in New England. The album includes the theme to his cable access show "Nukebusters TV" which is meant to educate the public about the dangers of nuclear power and the effort to get

Pitt & Hopkins make Joe Black divine

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

MEET JOE BLACK
Directed by Martin Brest
with Brad Pitt, Anthony Hopkins, Claire Forlani
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

Meet Joe Black is undoubtedly a triumph — a triumph of life and a celebration of its many pleasures. Despite the literal personification and actual incarnation of death, the movie traverses its seemingly dark subject matter to explore life, love and happiness. Ultimately, life comes to dominate the movie and symbolically even manages to take hold of Death himself.

The rather elaborate plot centers on Bill Parrish, who is the wealthy owner of a communications corporation and apparently has everything a man could want. On the eve of his 65th birthday, Death visits him, in person, saying that his time is up. However, Death will prolong Bill's life if he agrees to be a tour guide while Death takes a holiday, so to speak. Hence, the mysterious Joe Black is born.

Things get more complicated when Bill's daughter, Susan, falls in love with Joe even though she knows nothing about him. When Bill protests, Joe only asserts his authority in the situation. Except for one admittedly distracting subplot, the movie focuses on this triangle of relationships and how they resolve themselves.

Appropriately, three absolutely divine acting performances give life to these relationships and carry the movie. Brad Pitt, with his delightfully boyish good looks, plays Death and, as comical as this idea may seem, Pitt turns in an amazing, Oscar-worthy effort as Joe Black.

To his credit, Pitt goes far beyond looking the part of the innocent, naive visitor. He becomes enraptured by this new world and its simple pleasures, not the least of which is love. His mannerisms and demeanor are perfect, reflecting this fascination, this captivation. His childlike simplicity provides an unlikely, but welcomed, charisma and humor for the movie. The audience simply delights in his charm and ignorant bliss.

Anthony Hopkins, who is always good, may be overlooked next to Pitt, but his performance as Bill Parrish was also excellent. Hopkins slips so easily from his original confusion, desperation and resignation into proud defiance and ultimately quiet understanding that his change seems natural and hardly noticeable. And that's exactly what makes his performance brilliant.

Like Pitt, Claire Forlani goes beyond being beautiful in her quietly understated role as Susan — both a daughter and a lover. In addition to lighting up the screen, Forlani shows enormous depth by being quietly vulnerable, understandably nervous and subtly self-conscious.

Meanwhile, director Martin Brest (Scent of a Woman) provides beautifully lit backgrounds for the story. The glamour and grandeur of Parrish's world provide an almost idyllic setting for this type of "other-worldly" story. Everything seems to glow and glitter with an aura of light that provides a distinct visceral quality to the movie. There's an overwhelming sense of magnificence that encapsulates the characters and the movie.

In fact, my biggest problem with the movie is that it might have been a bit too grandiose. At over three hours, the movie was unnecessarily long. It simply tried to do too much. At times, the story strays from the three main characters for no apparent reason. There are some great scenes that probably should have been left out because they just don't relate to the main story.

I'll admit that a lot of Meet Joe Black's scenes are delightfully slow, teasingly restrained and beautifully filmed — the linger of a glance across a room, the ecstasy of discovering a new pleasure and the exaltation of an utter impossibility. Others, however, are painfully slow and agonizingly prolonged.

Partly because of its intricate plot, the movie also has a hard time ending. It seems like every shot for the last 15 minutes or so can end the movie. While this prolonged conclusion allows for some striking parallels between Joe and Bill — mutual admiration, the reluctance to let go of life and the sense of loss after leaving the same woman whom they both love — it seems almost anti-climatic and somehow disappointing.

Fortunately, great acting, a good director and some stunning cinematography more than compensate for what is, at times, a convoluted screenplay. Meet Joe Black goes beyond the basic love story and examines the world at a much deeper level. It is humorous at times and extremely powerful at others. Most of all, Meet Joe Black does what most good movies do: it causes you to take a step back and reexamine life. Even if it's only for a second, that is its greatest achievement. B+ rid of it. The track includes vocal sampling from the TV series.

Hardin has also produced a feature length film which follows the group and its attempts to educate the residents in the path of a nuclear reactor that was shipped from Rowe to be buried in Barnwell, S.C.

He sees a strong connection between all of his projects, "both my music, my videos, and my work is an antidote to corporate media programming. It in general focuses on trying to help people to shake off this capitalist programming that we've all been exposed to since birth."

In fact he currently has a series of videos for his music running on cable access in Northampton.

The easiest way to describe the bands sound is to list Hardin's influences.

"The person who is most influential to me is Robert Fripp, the guitarist for the British band King Crimson, not only in his playing but also in his articulate person. His words and music have been very helpful to me as a musician," he said.

He adds that Pink Floyd, Frank Zappa, Brian Eno and Peter Gabriel also made an impression upon him. The CD is more than the sum of its instruments, whether synthesized or not. It is rather a mood, an environment conducive to the ideals that Hardin promotes. It flows as one would have imagined that the Hallucigenia Sparsa did, against the grain.

It is available in Northampton at Turn it Up, Discoveries and Dynamite Records.

Winfrey's Beloved gets no love from audiences

Bryan McAllister

Trying to find something positive in the box-office performance of Oprah Winfrey's Beloved is like trying to find a two-syllable word in a Police Academy movie. The haunting slave drama, based on the novel by Toni Morrison, has earned a paltry $21 million and is slipping away from theaters faster than you can say "I Still Know What You Did Last Summer".

Of course, maybe we should be happy that it reaped in more cash than John Carpenter's Vampires.

But at the cost of $80 million, Beloved is simply one of the worst flops that its studio, Disney, has ever seen. Said Disney chairman Joe Roth to the New York Times, "You try to do something good, artistic, adult. It's like barking in the wind."

Not that other recent films about the black experience haven't barked without a bite as well. Steven Spielberg's Amistad achieved a quite less-than-desirable $44 million, and John Singleton's Rosewood was... well, has anyone even heard of it?

Black activists complain that African-American artists aren't represented enough in Hollywood. While this may be true, should we blame Hollywood, or ourselves? After all, we're the ones paying to go see these films, or rather, not paying. If audiences don't come, you can't ridicule Hollywood for not making enough important, diversified movies.

It didn't use to be this way. A decade ago, Spielberg and Winfrey collaborated on Alice Walker's The Color Purple, and the film was a huge success, garnering $94 million.

And certainly, there has been an improvement in the performance of "serious" movies recently. Two Oscar contenders, Saving Private Ryan and The Truman Show, both broke the $100-million mark this summer, while Godzilla failed to reach expectations.

But if anything, audiences are showing that neither big blockbusters nor heavy-handed dramas really interest them. What does capture their attention, particularly that of the 17-year-old boy, are low-budget, low-brow comedies and low-budget, low-taste horror movies. Just look at this fall, when Rush Hour and Adam Sandler's The Waterboy set new records for box-office achievement. And the real winner of the summer was the hilariously tasteless There's Something About Mary.

Likewise, the surprise success of Scream and all the Scream rip-offs is leading to a trend that must make Hollywood studio honchos add extra whip cream to their sundaes. Just look at the advantages:

1. Make a film for little cost.
2. Few special effects or post-production — so movies can be made faster.
3. No big stars needed — so no big egos to deal with.
4. And, the best plus — the movies play so well with the teen audience that they become part of popular culture, inspiring merchandise, sequels, magazine covers and fanatic fan worship.

What results is an assembly-line mentality in movie making, and there's no room in an assembly line for projects which may cross the line a little bit.

Why don't people want to watch movies about slavery? Common word-of-mouth shows that audiences realize that such films are important, but simply don't want to handle all the emotion of the experience. They want to be entertained, and Beloved or Amistad isn't exactly a movie you can really enjoy your popcorn with. It's unfortunate, though — if neither the most powerful woman nor the most powerful man in Hollywood can bring in audiences to see these films, who will?

Killer revealed on "Port Charles"

Hi soap fans. It's been two weeks since we last dished soaps and in that time a lot has happened. During the early '80s you could skip an entire week's worth of your favorite soap and still know what was going on. This isn't your mother's soap however. If you miss a week's worth of episodes now, chances are you'll be shaking your head wondering, "Nikolas slept with who? Catherine? I didn't even know the two of them were friends?"

It's all an attempt to rope an audience who's attention span is slowly eroding. The solution? Pack as much crap as you possibly can in one hour's worth of show. I thought about indulging you with my encounter with "GH"'s resident hottie, Christopher (aka Nikolas) but I'll save that for next week's article.

Let's start with "Port Charles." Last Friday, the killer's identity was revealed (at least to the audience). Turns out the killer was none other than [illegible] awhile there, I was convinced the killer was [illegible] who seems to be on edge all the time. [illegible] became pretty obvious, at least towards the end, that Julie was the culprit. I mean, did you [illegible] out she was during those elevator [illegible]

I'm still not convinced that [illegible] innocent though. I think he knows more than he's willing to let on. Now it looks like Julie and Cooper ("PC"s" resident psycho) might be in on it together. Don't expect the denizens of "PC" to catch on just yet however. It might be a few more weeks before the game is up and rumor has it her parting shot may involve the death of one of "PC"'s main players.

Which one? You honestly think I'd tell you and ruin the surprise!

Not much going on as far as "Days of Our Lives" goes. It's been a relatively quiet month for the show. I do think last week's tiff between Mike and Austin is worth mentioning though. First of all, who does Mike think he is, giving Austin marital advice? I realize he's trying to do what's right for all parties involved but the selfless hero routine is getting a bit old, not to mention hypocritical. If he really wanted to do Austin a favor he could start by "keeping it in his pants" (if you know what I mean) and stop fooling around with his wife.

In other "Days" news, Stefano takes a leap of faith and proposes to Vivian (like she's going to say "no" with that mood altering device jammed in her mouth). Also this week, Kate dupes Roman yet again. That guy just gets brighter and brighter every day, eh?

On the "General Hospital" front (of course I couldn't let a week go by without mentioning my baby), Sonny is back. From what I've heard, Maurice Benard has inked a new contract with the show that should keep him in Port Charles for at least a year. It'll be interesting to see how he's dealing with Brenda's "death." What's even more interesting is the timing of his return.

As we all know, Kimberly McCullough (Robin) is leaving the show sometime in December. Well, Maurice's return just happens to coincide with Kimberly's departure and rumors are flying fast and furious that Robin might meet the same fate as the late Mrs. Corrinthos, Lily. Could Robin be the innocent casualty in Sonny's war with the crime syndicate? And how would that affect his relationship with Jason?

In a bit of other news, Carly fans (like moi) can breathe a sigh of relief because Carly is back at home [illegible] just saw a clip of her encounter [illegible] was it good. She barely even [illegible] existence and when she did it [illegible] I just loved watching her prey [illegible] If I were Robin I'd pack my [illegible] out of there cause we all know. [illegible] gets (even if she has to knock [illegible] in a laundry basket).

[illegible] ating up as of late. In case you [illegible] eady heard. Annie's back in [illegible] en there all along disguised as [illegible] Teri Demarco (post-plastic [illegible] prising revelatoin that was, eh? I [illegible] here was more to Teri than met the eye but never in my wildest dreams did I imagine she was Annie in disguise.

My question is, what's her deal with Frank and why is she suddenly so interested in tearing apart his marriage? I wasn't even aware that the two of them knew each other?

Shows to watch this week:

• Friday's "GH:" According to my sources, Nikolas and Catherine finally give in to temptation and make love. Should be hot!

• Friday's "SB:" Father Antonio and Gabi find themselves in a compromising position. Apparently both of them end up sharing a hot tub. You know what that means ladies? Not getting enough sleep? Here are a few tips to help

Sleep deprivation, also known as sleep debt, is something many of us suffer from. It is sleep loss that accumulates from one night to the next. Six hours or less of sleep in a night over a consecutive period of two days or more causes sleep deprivation.

Here are some simple tips to prevent it:

1. Plan and organize each day to provide for the time needed for a beneficial night of seven to nine hours of sleep.
2. Associate your bed with drowsiness, relaxation and sleep.
3. Eat nutritionally balanced meals.
4. Relaxation exercises, meditation, prayer and/or soothing music will aid in falling asleep.
5. Lowering the thermostat to a cooler temperature facilitates sleep by decreasing core body temperature.
6. Minimize levels of light and sound.
7. Napping for more than one hour may make it difficult to fall asleep at bedtime.
8. Reduce alcohol and caffeine consumption. Don't drink caffeine within six hours of bed time.
9. Nicotine is a stimulant and can cause difficulty in sleeping.
10. Exercise on a regular basis; it facilitates deep sleep in the sleep cycle.
11. Schedule a regular sleep pattern.

It has been proven that students with regular healthy sleep patterns have a higher GPA than other students. Prepare for finals now, get a good night's sleep every night!

Reeve returns in classic remake

This Sunday night, TV viewers get a special treat on ABC at 9 p.m. As many people know, Vince Vaughn is set to star as Norman Bates in the remake of Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho to be released in movie theaters next week. What some people may not know is that Christopher Reeve will be making a triumphant return to Hollywood this weekend with his remake of another Hitchcock classic, "Rear Window," in his first role since his accident two years ago.

In "Rear Window," Reeve plays a paralyzed man who is forced to become a voyeur simply to pass the time, and while he is spying on people through the window of his hospital room, he sees what he thinks is a murder, and becomes determined to get involved in what is going on.

The main difference between this version of "Rear Window" and Hitchcock's 1954 classic is that the lead character was hospitalized, but not paralyzed. Reeve has received much praise, not only for his ability to return to the screen, but for his boldness in choosing this role. Reeve is also currently shooting the movie version of his autobiography, "Still Me" in which he describes how his life has changed since the terrible accident, and what steps are being done to try to make his life a whole lot easier.

All together, "Rear Window" should be interesting to watch. If nothing else, it may be an indication of how well the new Psycho movie will work when it arrives on the big screen.

Guess who's on the prowl again? Everyone's favorite charming "Who's the Boss" daughter, Alyssa Milano. It seems that every week the hooligan has something nice to whine about, and this week is no exception. Milano, who did an interview with Boston radio station WAAF this past Monday, told listeners that she is fed up with nude pictures of her being passed around the Internet, and allied with her mother, they plan to stop Internet porn.

She plans to go about doing this through creating her own search engine, which will not allow any sites that have nude pictures of anyone to appear. As I have expressed before in many previous Tube Notes columns, I'm not a very big Milano fan, I'm pretty sure I'm not alone on that thought, and when she comes out and says things like this, it's easy to see why.

I'm always willing to help someone in need though, so Alyssa, if you're reading, (which I think there's more of a chance that I'm going to be the starting point guard in UMass' game against Kansas this season than there is that Alyssa Milano is reading my column) here's a tip on how to get nude pictures of yourself taken off the Internet: As tough as it may be, next time you shoot a movie, try to keep your clothes on. I understand that may be a lot to ask, but it's just a suggestion.

As a matter of fact, any time you look in front of you, and see a round object with a lens — that's called a camera, and you should never get naked in front of it. So in essence, if you think that taking your clothes off in front of people you've never met before is a good idea, don't get all upset when there are a lot more people than you thought who get to see you in your birthday suit.

In other news, the TV world is gearing up for Thanksgiving, and that means tons of movies, football and publicity stunts to get you watching so you can see commercials of things that you absolutely have to buy for Christmas. This Tuesday, Jonathan Taylor Thomas will return to the show that made him a star, "Home Improvement," because he felt that he'd be nice, and go home for the holidays.

Even with JTT returning to the show, it will still get lousy ratings, and continue to fall far below the standard which it used to set for today's popular sitcoms. It's too bad that this has happened to what used to be such a great show.

Almost all hit TV shows go through the same type of curve when talking about the life span that they cover. Most times, it starts of strong, throwing the viewer directly what the show's message is and why it's on the air. When "Home Improvement" did this in the late '80s, it passed the viewers desirability test with flying colors; however, it did not pass the most difficult phase on the curve that shows have to go through, and that's the major change that almost always kills a show's popularity.

Somewhere in the middle of it's nine-year run, Tim Allen, writer, director and star of the sitcom, decided that the show was going to be used to teach people a lesson, instead of just entertaining. It began to barrage viewers with episode about, what happens if your kid starts doing drugs, and how to deal with things like, illness, abandonment and death.

The advertisements for the show began to get much like those of "Party of Five," where for almost an entire week, we'd see what awful situation Tim was placed into now, and we'd have to watch next week to see how he was ever going to cope with it.

The problem is that at some point, the comedy element changed, and not only was the show no longer funny, but it got old as well. Most of the characters have been pretty much the same throughout the run of the series, and the only room for change was in the youngest member of the family, Mark. Allen did an awful job at that, when he decided that Mark was going to become a Marilyn Manson wannabe, and when that didn't go over well with viewers, he just reverted back to the same old character which we had seen in so many episodes over the last few years.

The bottom line is "Home Improvement" did not deal well with change, and neither did its army of loyal viewers which has long since disbanded.

Finally, it's official that the WWF has made an agreement with the NFL, and they will have at least one spot to show off their stuff in a commercial during this year's Super Bowl in Miami. The WWF claims that the spot will be used to advertise for March's Wrestlemania, however it's my theory that it's actually going to be an endorsement for the next governor of Florida.

sion. As far as winter hats go, let's face it, they're all ridiculous. That's why I'm suggesting you be as unconventional as possible. Go wild and choose something with a little flare. What do you have to lose?

My second tip of the week is something I stumbled upon just recently. The gals I've talked to are all raving about boys with thumb rings. They say it gives guys a sexy edge and just screams James Dean.

In closing I thought I'd include an element that is often overlooked, namely cologne. There's nothing women take more notice of than how a guy smells, that is if you're lucky enough to get within 10 feet of her. My friends and I cruised down to the mall a few weeks ago and tested just about every cologne known to man. Here are our top five picks:

1) Jean Paul Gaultier
2) Curve
3) Eternity
4) Polo Sport
5) Estee Lauder's Pleasures

~ Film Clips ~

A selection of reviewed films playing in the local area:

ANTZ (Dir Erie Darnell, with the voices of Woody Allen, Sharon Stone, playing at Hampshire). From the very first scene, Antz captivates the audience with its small, fanciful world, creating an elaborate, visually deep microcosm of our own society. Worker ant Z (Allen) searches for princess Bala (Stone) while saving his colony from evil. Features a witty script and the voices of Sylvester Stallone and Gene Hackman. B (Adam Murtigenetti)

APT PUPIL (Dir Bryan Singer, with Brad Renfro, Ian McKellen, playing at Hampshire) Singer's follow-up to The Usual Suspects doesn't have the ending of that first film, but has all the elements of darkness and evil, along with some great acting by Brad Renfro and Ian McKellen. Singer masterfully puppeteers the characters in a story about a young boy searching for the secrets of an old Nazi war criminal. Based on the novella by Stephen King. B+ (A.M.)

LOLITA (Dir Adrian Lyne, with Jeremy Irons, Dominique Swain, playing at Pleasant St.) With all of the hype and anger surrounding this new version of Lolita, going to see it feels like you're in a strange club, watching a snuff film or a Pamela and Tommy Lee honeymoon video. Unfortunately, the product simply does not meet the demand. The story of an old scholar falling in love with a pre-teen girl is vastly inferior to the artistic eroticism of the classic novel, largely because of inconsistent performances from Irons and Swain and Hollywoodized directing from Lyne. C– (Mike Messaros)

MEET JOE BLACK (Dir Martin Brest, with Brad Pitt, Anthony Hopkins, playing at Mountain Farms) Divine acting by Pitt, Hopkins and newcomer Claire Forlani lifts this tale of love and death beyond just the good looks and beautiful photography. Pitt especially succeeds, investing his role with a child-like naivety. While the pace is slow at times, it adds to the movie's ability to capture the magic of life. Director Brest sometimes tries too hard, but Meet Joe Black is a triumph of spirit nonetheless. B+ (A.M.)

PLEASANTVILLE (Dir Gary Ross, with Tobey Meguire, Joan Allen, playing at Hampshire) Simple fable of two 90's teenagers whisked into a 50's TV show turns into a slightly flawed but pleasing parable of anti-conformity and following your heart. In perfect "Pleasantville," Mom always cooks a hearty breakfast, Dad's in a bowling league and the basketball team always has a perfect shooting percentage. But all is not well in happyland: along with the perfect life comes crushing conformity and emotional deadness, symbolized here with black and white film. Brilliant use of color and visual effects relieve this. B+ (R.R.)

PRACTICAL MAGIC (Dir Griffin Dunne, with Sandra Bullock, Nicole Kidman, playing at Mountain Farms) Practical Magic is nearly two hours of music, special effects and cute acting in search of a real movie. Sandra Bullock and Nicole Kidman do their best in hollow roles as two bewitched sisters dealing with the problems of life and love, but Practical Magic is much too cliched and empty. C– (A.M.)

THE WATERBOY (Dir Frank Coraci, with Adam Sandler, Henry Winkler, playing at Hampshire) Hot off The Wedding Singer, Sandler's most complete movie, the resident Hollywood goofball puts together a by-the-numbers, cliched sports flick in The Waterboy. But since when are we looking at artistic merit. Sandler plays Bobbs Boucher, a dumb Cajun waterboy who soon discovers a talent for flying tackles and joins the team. Sandler is funny and charismatic as always, but this a one-joke movie. B–

WHAT DREAMS MAY COME (Dir Vincent Ward, with Robin Williams, Cuba Gooding Jr., playing at Hoyts, Springfield). What Dreams May Come begins with the form of a hero's journey into the underworld and then revisions it through the lens of Hollywood schmaltz. The movie is tear-jerking and occasionally beautiful, especially some eerie, hypnotic editing and sharp special effects that turn a painting into a landscape. Williams plays a doctor whose death echoes that of his children years before, and journeys to heaven to find them, and soon after, his wife. But What Dreams May Come is a hollow exercise in American pop-spirituality, glossing over complicated ideas like religion, madness and family. C– (R.R.)

Box set shows Springsteen's strengths

By Larry McShane
Associated Press

NEW YORK — When The Boss received word of his induction into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, it came from an unlikely source.

"I think my aunt told me," a laughing Bruce Springsteen said in an interview three days after word of the honor became public. "She's 80 years old. She goes on the Internet. That's how I found out."

The announcement came Nov. 10 — the same day that Springsteen released the four-CD, 66-song boxed set "Tracks." The amazing assembly of unreleased material and B-sides makes an eloquent argument for Springsteen's inclusion.

The set opens with Springsteen's first Columbia Records recordings, acoustic versions of four songs off his debut "Greetings From Asbury Park." It winds through the years with the E Street Band, stretches into his solo work in the late 1980s and '90s and ends with a song recorded just three months ago.

It also makes one thing clear: Springsteen's rejects are a lot better than most everybody else's keepers.

"Goin' in, I knew it would be quite a job, 'cause I knew there was a lot of material," Springsteen said. "It wound up being a lot easier than I thought."

Typically, Springsteen started the project several years ago. "I think it might have been before (1995's) 'Ghost of Tom Joad,' I decided, 'I think I'm going to listen to everything I've ever done,'" he said with a chuckle. "So the engineer sent me a big box of tapes, and I spent a week or more going through 'em."

But then he released an album, and did his first solo acoustic tour. And the tapes were still waiting when he returned home. The first cut winnowed the 25 years worth of recordings into a more manageable 130 songs. Springsteen was surprised by how complete — and how entertaining — most of the recordings were.

"I'd left off a lot of the stuff that was the most fun — must be my Catholic upbringing," he joked. "One after another, rocking party songs, bar band numbers... I was having a lot of fun listening."

The material runs the gamut from the eight-minute extravaganza "Thundercrack," from 1973's sessions for "The Wild, The Innocent and the E Street Shuffle," to a string of three- and four-minute late '70s/early '80s gems: rhythm and blues tunes like "Give the Girl a Kiss" and "So Young and in Love," rockers like "Loose Ends" and "Rendezvouz."

"Put that together, and there's a missing album," Springsteen said.

Connecticut continues to make push to bring Patriots to Hartford

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — Talks are continuing, but there is no deal yet to move the New England Patriots from suburban Boston to Hartford, a spokesman for Connecticut Gov. John G. Rowland said yesterday.

Rowland spokesman Dean Pagani flatly denied a report by WVIT-TV that a deal had been offered Patriots owner Robert Kraft and that Kraft had 48 hours to make up his mind.

"It's not true," Pagani said. "There is no deal at this point; there is no timetable; the negotiations are continuing." WVIT said it was standing by its report.

A Patriots spokesman said the team had no immediate comment to the WVIT report.

WTNH-TV quoted Rowland as saying that the current negotiations center on Connecticut's exclusive right to deal with the Patriots, and not the terms of any deal itself.

Unless Connecticut secured that exclusive right, the Patriots could play one state off another.

The governor said he and legislative leaders agree the process should not be dragged out.

"If there's a good deal there for everybody to be made, I think we can do it sooner than later," Rowland told WTNH.

Pagani spoke outside the governor's official residence, where Rowland briefed business executives, legislative leaders and Hartford city officials.

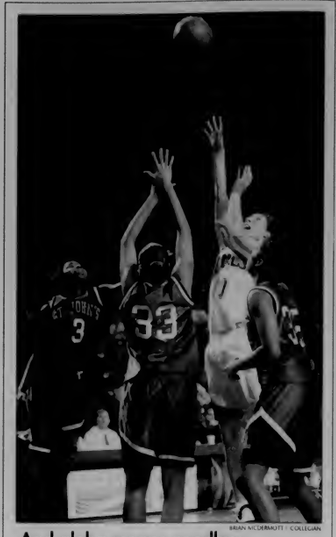
"The talks are serious, but they are not there yet," said Hartford Mayor Michael Peters.

About two dozen people attended the meeting yesterday afternoon. A knot of reporters clustered outside the residence, awaiting word. The story led every evening newscast in town.

Rowland had postponed a trip to the Republican Governors' Association meeting in New Orleans because the negotiations were in flux. He may leave today for that meeting, Pagani said. Peters said any deal would revolve around a $350 million, 65,000-seat, open-air stadium in downtown Hartford, part of a larger proposed development known as Adriaen's Landing.

Adriaen's Landing is a $1 billion development intended to revitalize Hartford's aging downtown, which still shows the scars of the most recent recession.

Robert Fiondella, an insurance executive who is the driving force behind Adriaen's Landing, has said he would not want the project to be delayed by a Patriots deal. But the proposed location, at the downtown intersection of Interstates 84 and 91, is the logical site for a stadium.



The project is named for the Dutch explorer who sailed up the Connecticut River in 1614. As proposed, it would include shops, restaurants, a convention center and a domed stadium of at least 35,000 seats so the University of Connecticut could upgrade its football program to Division 1-A.

Kentucky and Tennessee set to face off on Saturday

With due respect to The Game and the Big Game, a few other rivalries on Saturday have turned into Really Big Games.

Top-ranked Tennessee (9-0, 6-0 SEC) plays for more than the Beer Barrel when Kentucky (7-3, 4-3) visits Neyland Stadium. With a win, the Volunteers clinch a berth in the SEC title game on Dec. 5 and move a step closer to a national title.

"I think our kids have a genuine respect for Kentucky," Vols coach Phillip Fulmer said. "They know the consequences of this game and continuing on nationally."

Fulmer is so focused on Saturday's game, he's in the dark about what else is going on.

"I couldn't tell you who else is playing," said Fulmer, working on ways to slow Wildcats quarterback Tim Couch, who has thrown for 3,938 yards and 34 TDs. "It's just such a challenge here."

Tragedy strikes Kentucky & UK football

THOUSANDSTICKS, Ky. (AP) — School was canceled yesterday in the district where Scott Brock volunteered as an assistant high school football coach, and mourners spilled outside a church, watching his funeral on a television monitor.

The 21-year-old Eastern Kentucky student died early Sunday on a hunting trip when a pickup truck driven by a friend — University of Kentucky starting center Jason Watts — flipped.

Kentucky player Artie Steinmetz, a Michigan State transfer who was sitting out the season, also died in the crash.

Watts was charged Tuesday with second-degree manslaughter and driving under the influence after tests showed his blood-alcohol content was 1 1/2 times the legal limit.

Yesterday, Brock's maroon No. 5 Leslie County football jersey hung in the front of the church near his casket, along with photographs from his playing career.

Brock's best friend, Kentucky quarterback Tim Couch, sat on a folding chair along the front row of the church as pastor Steve Springer described Brock as friendly and always willing to help others.

Watts, who sustained a gash the length of his right forearm, was upgraded to good condition yesterday at the University of Kentucky Medical Center.

Couch, who has rewritten the Wildcats' record book, grew up with Brock in the nearby mountain town of Hyden. He did not speak at yesterday's service, but earlier in the week choked back tears as he remembered his friend.

"I never met a guy that didn't like him," Couch said. "He just kind of grows on you. He's just one of those people that's just real down to earth, a good guy that everybody wants to be around."

Today, the Kentucky football team will take a bus to northern Kentucky for Steinmetz's funeral.

Steinmetz's mother, Therese, lashed out at prosecutors for bringing charges against Watts.

"No one — no one — will ever replace my son Artie and... that poor young man is in the hospital trying to heal and get well and he's being charged with something like this. It's just unbelievable and not necessary," she told the Herald-Leader.

UM women's rugby has solid 1998 fall season

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's rugby team recently concluded its 1998 fall season with the Northeast Regional championships that were held here at UMass last weekend.

The Minutewomen defeated Yale 17–5 in their first game of the weekend, but dropped a 26–5 match at the hands of the Dartmouth Big Green.

With the split, UMass remained as the No. 2 Division I team in the Northeast, and qualified for the National Sweet 16s that will be held in the spring.

"We may not have physically been the biggest girls in the league, but we had the biggest hearts. Our intensity was unmatched by any other team," co-captain Jenny Linker said. "I don't think that anyone ever thought we'd make it to nationals this season. It just goes to show you that having a good work ethic and a positive attitude can carry a team a long way."

After Yale jumped out to a 5–0 lead in the first game, UMass tied it at 5–5 on a try by Shauna Farrell. The scoring barrage continued when Shannon Wallace and Laura Sauro added tries to make it 15–5. Linker then rounded out the scoring with a conversion to finalize a 17–5 victory.

Dartmouth, however, came out with its guns loaded in the weekend's second game. The Big Green scored three tries and added three conversions for a 21–0 lead. Sauro would attempt to start a comeback with a try, but the New Hampshire school would match that with one of its own to make it 26–5. Sauro would add another try later in the contest, but it wouldn't be enough in a 26–10 loss.

Nevertheless, the Minutewomen were pleased with their efforts in the fall season, and are eager to get things going for the spring season.

"I was very impressed with the team this season," co– captain Natalie Morales said. "I'm sure that next year we will continue to grow and improve as we compete in nationals."

For the graduating seniors, they will look to continue their run towards the top when they get one final crack in the spring.

"Being part of a team where you can depend on every player and know that your teammates are your friends has been what made me love being here," senior Sandra Wharton said. "Winning was just the icing on the cake."

Said Carrie Wegman: "The dedication and commitment of each and every member of this team showed throughout the entire season proved to be the factor that brought us to where we are today — one of the top 16 teams in the nation.

UMass finished its season with a 7–1 record and was a perfect 5–0 in the regular season. They were the only team in New England to have a blemish-free regular season.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Your loyalty may be put to the test today by a friend who doesn't understand the serious nature of an unexpected situation. Be patient and forthcoming.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You may have a chance to share a special talent with someone who is in a position to do you some good, either personally or professionally.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Now is not the time to seek out what is luxurious or self-indulgent. Your temperament right now is more suited for enjoying the basics.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Variety is the spice of life. But when you have one particularly good thing going for you, as you do right now, you've no need for anything else.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You're feeling aggressive and acquisitive today. You'll surely know how to go after what you want in a direct, forthright, unabashed fashion.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — This is a good day to explore your feelings, but you mustn't let emotions get the better of you. Balance your heart and head with care.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — There are more options open to you at this time than you had foreseen. Making a simple choice may actually prove quite daunting today.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You must take care that your motives are as pure as possible today. You cannot afford to be misunderstood by anyone at this time.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You should be able to do on your own what you've challenged your critics to do. Today, your performance at work can prove quite remarkable.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You have every reason to feel like you're riding a wave of good fortune at this time. However, you must take precautions and avoid becoming careless.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You'll enjoy spending time with someone you consider to be one of your most enthusiastic supporters. Use care! You have to ask yourself if you're only trying to feed your ego.LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — "What goes around, comes around," or so they say. Today, you should be able to put the adage to the test, and come out a winner.

Quote of the Day

"If God dwells inside us, like some people say, I sure hope he likes enchiladas, because that's what he's getting."

The Pats woes; plus some early playoff thoughts

Can the competition get any fiercer than in the AFC East? Our beloved Patriots are plummeting to a 5–5 season to date, and are all the way down in fourth place. The Dolphins are ahead at 7–3, and the Jets and Bills are right behind with 6–4 marks. So, providing you all have your math working for you, that's four teams within two games of each other with six contests remaining. The only squad that is out of the running is the pathetic Colts, who, at 2–8, have only the spoiler role to play.

Picking not so perfect a time to flush their season down the toilet, the Patriots went 1–4 over the last five games in a crucial division stretch, beating only the lowly Indianapolis Colts, whom the Collegian staff could defeat if we played on our home turf. With all the injuries that face New England, like those to wide-outs Vincent Brisby and Terry Glenn, the bleeding is probably not done.

A key matchup in the outcome of this melee is Monday night's contest in Foxboro between the Patriots and the division-leading Miami Dolphins. If New England can get out of its hole, it can narrow the gap for the AFC East title to a game, and, well, the Pats historically play well down the final stretch. I'm crossing my fingers...

• New York had me going there for a little while. Head honcho Bill Parcells took a team with no talent and no ambition and made it into a contender — a pretty strong contender, no less. In only his second year with the team after having screwed the Patriots, the Jets are primed to push for a division title.

Then they lost to the Colts.

• The Bills will be competitive as long as Thurman Thomas is taking the snaps, but the former Canadian champ won't win the Super Bowl. Flutie, with Andre Reed and Bruce Smith, can win the division. This weekend, Buffalo will inflate its record with a game against Indianapolis.

• Moving on, the playoff picture is starting to come into focus now in both conferences. Like I've been rambling about for a while now, the AFC East is up for grabs. In a division where four teams can challenge for a conference title, only one will probably make the playoffs because they'll beat each other's crucial, tie-breaking division records into worthlessness.

• Jacksonville will make the post-season, and might very well win the division, but it won't go far in the playoffs due to its shaky play against upper echelon teams.

• The Steelers and Oilers are coming on strong, and could tag-team to put three AFC Central teams in the playoffs, on the strength of their respective quarterbacks, Kordell Stewart and Steve McNair.

• I'm not even going to go into Denver's chances. If the duo of John Elway and Bubby Brister don't win a second consecutive Super Bowl, it will be a surprise. Also, don't be surprised to see Terrell Davis cross the 2,000-yard mark.

• Oakland might sneak into the playoffs ahead of Tennessee in a wild card spot, but the Raiders will not challenge come January.

• In the worst division in pro sports, the Dallas Cowboys will take a break from the sex and drugs to win it. When your competition consists of the Cardinals, Giants, Redskins and the Eagles, you can win wearing handcuffs and a syringe.

• Minnesota and San Francisco will win their respective divisions, despite the latter currently being in second place to the Atlanta Falcons.

The Falcons are legit, though, and when the season ends, they'll surprise some people, as I found out the hard way when they came to Foxboro.

• Fighting for the other two wild card spots will be the Saints, the Cardinals and the Packers, with Green Bay taking one for sure.

Koenig's bold predictions of the week:

Because I'm a miserable failure at these predictions, sporting a 6–7 record overall, I'm going to pick only one game to try and redeem myself [or bring my mark to an even .500]. If I had a bookie, I'd have no fingers to type this with.

My bold prediction this week is Oakland to cover the 10 1/2-point spread against the hosting Broncos. Now, we all know that Denver is the best team in the NFL, but the Raiders always play up to the Broncs, as the two partake in the biggest rivalry in football. Also working in Oakland's favor, is the they-can't-win-forever rule, and, after 10 unbeaten weeks, it's high-time for Denver to experience some turbulence.

St. John's disposes of UM hoops, 73–69

Minutemen drops behind Red Storm early; despite comeback attempt, UMass falls

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

JAMAICA, N.Y. — The Big Apple turned out to be rotten for the Massachusetts men's basketball team.

The Minutemen were able to get away with first-half jitters at home against Niagara, but on the road against an inspired St. John's team, it was clearly the difference.

Their tentative first half play from Monday's opener seemed to carry over to the first half of last night's contest for the Minutemen (1–1), who were defeated by the host Red Storm, 73–69, in front of a jam-packed Alumni Hall.

"I have to give St. John's credit," Massachusetts coach James "Bruiser" Flint said. "We knew that it was going to be a tough go for us, but you still have to give St. John's a lot of credit."

Flint must have known his team was scrambling on offense. Junior forward Mike Babul, known more as a defender than a scorer, notched only the squad's third and fourth points just seven and a half minutes into the contest. After its opening frame was plagued by turnovers and missed shots, UMass managed to settle down and trim the deficit to 35–27 at the half.

Flint must have known his team was scrambling on offense. Junior forward Mike Babul, known more as a defender than a scorer, notched only the squad's third and fourth points just seven and a half minutes into the contest. After its opening frame was plagued by turnovers and missed shots, UMass managed to settle down and trim the deficit to 35–27 at the half.

"This is the best performance he's had in a UMass uniform," said Flint of Babul, who scored a career-high 15 points. "He played a great game because he took it to people.

"But I think that we played a little afraid. The second half there was more intensity. We picked it up a bit and got back in the game."

Before the start of the contest, UMass center Lari Ketner (13 points) had anticipated that St. John's coach Mike Jarvis would employ a number of double teams and trapping tactics to stop him from scoring. As a result of the constant pressure, the 6-foot-10 All-America candidate was unable to connect on his first four shots from the field.

"It was frustrating for him because he was right there," Flint said.

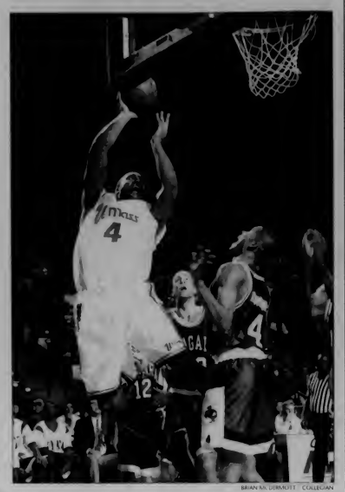
After the difficult opening half, the Minutemen finally established their inside game at the start of the second frame. On two separate occasions, they managed to cut the Red Storm to six points.

However, after Ajmal Basit and Ketner picked up their fourth personal fouls before the 10-minute mark of the second half, UMass was unable to muster another run at the lead.

St. John's junior forward Lavor Postell opened the flood gates for the hosts, netting 13 points while hitting a number of clutch shots in both the first and second halves. For UMass, Babul and junior guard Monty Mack paced the Minutemen offense with 15 points apiece.

Mack cut the lead to 49–41 before Postell responded with a three-point play. Following the whistle Flint was assessed with a technical foul, and his team suddenly trailed by 14 points.

Red Storm forward Tyrone Grant did most of his damage in the second half, and finished with a game-high 20 points and pulled down 17 rebounds for St. John's (2–0).



"It was a challenge," Grant said. "I had to play hard and come through for the team against a front line like UMass'."

With the victory, Jarvis improved his overall record against UMass to 10–8. Even though he's now coaching in a different conference the end result remained the same... perhaps with only one difference.

"I think that the one thing that there's always been in every game against UMass is a technical foul," Jarvis said. "And I'm just glad I wasn't the one to get one this time."

Another bright spot for the Minutemen besides Babul was sophomore guard Rafael Cruz, who erupted for nine points on a perfect 3-for-3 from beyond the arc. Those shots helped UMass pull within four at the final buzzer.

"The thing that I liked about him was that he was ready. He knocked down some shots and did a good job for us," Flint said.

Fired-up SJU crowd puts Red Storm over the top

JAMAICA, N.Y. — Going into its second round match-up of the Chase Preseason NIT against St. John's University, the Massachusetts men's basketball team thought it had a size advantage. However, it turned out there was no Minuteman bigger than the Big Apple.

The 6,008 hostile fans that packed Alumni Hall in Jamaica, N.Y. welcomed UMass with a chorus of boos during the announcements of the starting lineups and proceeded to shake the 23rd-ranked Minutemen off of their game in the first half.

"We played a little afraid," Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint said. "We were the only ranked team who had to play away from home in the whole tournament [in this round], so they knew it was going to be a tough go for us."

Scoring only two points in the opening seven and a half minutes, Massachusetts watched several early calls work against them, and heard the harsh New York population jeer those that didn't.

For perhaps the first time in his collegiate career, forward Mike Babul, usually a defensive role player, was left to carry the offense — scoring six of the team's first 16 points.

BRIAN McDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Ajmal Basit and the Minutemen will look to rebound from last night's loss to St. John's on Dec. 1 against the College of Charleston.

"He was one of the ones who took it to people," Flint said. "I knew he could play that way."

All-America candidate Lari Ketner could not find his rhythm, missing his first four looks of the contest.

"We had a lot of easy looks inside," Babul said. "We were posting the ball and doing what we wanted to do, we just weren't knocking down the shots. Maybe the guys got a little frustrated at the beginning."

Fueled by the thunderous support, Red Storm players "Bootsy" Thornton and Lavor Postell tallied nine points each before the half.

As the game pressed on, the Minutemen seemed to gather their composure and avoided a total obliteration at the hands of St. John's. Shooting guard Monty Mack led the UMass scoring in the opening frame with eight points, followed closely behind by Babul and Ketner, who each had six.

Despite being down 16–4 at the 10:50 mark, the Minutemen managed to close the gap down at the end of the period, bringing the Red Storm lead to eight at 35–27.

Still, as the crowd stayed fired up after halftime, Massachusetts had difficulty drawing within striking range.

With a generously low four fouls called on St. John's, compared to the UMass total of 10, the Red Storm lead was an intimidating 14 points with 7:36 remaining in the game.

A technical foul on a frustrated Flint sent the city-dwelling Alumni Hall patrons into an antagonizing chant of "Bruiser."

"[The referee] said I put my hands in his face, but I don't know if I put my hands in his face," Flint said. "I don't remember that."

By the 5:44 mark, the Minutemen looked exhausted and disheartened, allowing the shorter Red Storm players to control the boards. SJU outrebounded the visitors 49–37.

Led more by their overpowering New York crowd than Grant, their eventual leading scorer and rebounder, with career-highs of 20 and 17 in those respective categories, the Red Storm sent Massachusetts home with an embarrassing 73–69 defeat.

St. John's, on the other hand, continued in its historical domination of UMass, increasing its all-time record to 7–0 over the Minutemen.

"You're in New York," one fanatic Red Storm fan yelled from the stands, as the sell-out crowd began to filter out of the arena with less than two minutes to go.

Perhaps the scoreboard could have told the Minutemen that.

Gonzalez easily takes American League MVP honors

Rangers outfielder wins prize ahead of Garciaparra, Jeter

NEW YORK (AP) — Juan Gonzalez was beaming.

Voted the American League's Most Valuable Player in a landslide, he already was looking ahead to today, fully expecting Sammy Sosa to get the NL honor.

"A special moment for all Latin America," Gonzalez said. "I'm waiting for [today]'s results... and praying for Sammy."

The Texas Rangers outfielder, whose 157 RBIs were the most in the AL in 49 years, beat Nomar Garciaparra 357-232 yesterday to win the MVP for the second time in three seasons.

Gonzalez, speaking from San Juan, said anticipation had been building in both Puerto Rico and the Dominican Republic, where Sosa lives. Gonzalez said he was having friends and family over for dinner and he anticipated a "big celebration here in Puerto Rico, especially my hometown, in my neighborhood, my people there."

In 1996, Gonzalez beat Seattle shortstop Alex Rodriguez 290-287 to win the MVP.

"The first time was too tight," Gonzalez said.

This year's honor made him the first Latin American native to win two MVPs. Gonzalez hit .318 with 45 homers, and had the most RBIs in the AL since Ted Williams and Vern Stephens each had 159 for Boston in 1949.

"The key for this year was staying healthy, playing 154 games," Gonzalez said. "When I'm healthy, I'm putting [up] the best numbers I can."

Six trips to the disabled list had limited Gonzalez to 134 games or fewer each year since 1993. But with his first complete first half

Amnesty Int'l working at UMass

By Mary Grein
Collegian Corespondent

Amnesty International is working together toward a common goal this year in it's campaign on the United States. "Rights for All."

The organization has been inspiring people to speak out against human rights issues since 1961 and has a chapter that meets regularly on campus.

Each Wednesday evening at 7:00 p.m., students at the University of Massachusetts can attend the meeting to become a part of actions that help fellow human beings.

At the most recent meeting, this past Wednesday, the group discussed the focuses of the continuing campaign.

Amnesty International is campaigning for an end to police brutality, an end to torture and abuse of prisoners, especially women, a code of conduct for arms sales, the protection of asylum-seekers, the abolition of the death penalty and juvenile justice.

The organization as a whole is ultimately attempting to call on the United States to bring its practices and laws into line with the international standards and allow everyone equal human rights.

As Jennifer-Lynn Jennings said during the meeting when speaking of the goals of the project, "it will challenge the authorities to live up to their human rights commitments."

At the past meeting, it was decided that presently, the group at UMass will focus their attention on three issues: asylum-seekers, the death penalty and the justice juveniles receive.

The facts on each issue are disturbing, as they detail the abuse millions of people are exposed to daily. For example, for the number of women that are imprisoned, 92 percent of them are being held as non-violent offenders and still continue to be chained and sexually assaulted.

Jennings said when discussing the statistics and facts she had learned, "Even prisoners have human rights and those rights are being violated in prison."

For asylum-seekers, a personally important issue for the members here on campus, the United States authorities persistently violate the fundamental human rights of people who have been forced to leave their countries to avoid continued torture, persecution and in some circumstances, death.

The last issue that the UMass chapter has chosen to work toward is the better treatment of juveniles within the criminal system.

The organization is working toward attempting to change the age at which a child can be tried as an adult. At the moment, a child can be tried as an adult as young as 7 years old in the state of Massachusetts.

The organization is also concerned with upgrading the education of children, instead of putting them right in prison.

As a member, Dan Ryan said, "Kids are the last people you would want in prison."

One idea suggested at the meeting was to improve education by running a book drive toward the end of March.

Fundraisers are seen as means not only to generate income, but to stimulate the community and raise awareness as well.

In addition to the work the organization is doing on their current campaigns, they continue to write letters in protest of international wrong-doings that they frequently receive news of from their headquarters.

UMass childcare reform sought

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Employee Organization (GEO), Local 2322/UAW, and the Graduate Student Senate (GSS) held a public forum in the Cape Cod Lounge yesterday as part of their Student Family Survival Campaign.

The organizations assembled a panel of University of Massachusetts faculty and staff members, and community activists, to hear testimony from student parents.

Cecilia Rio, a member of the Family Issues Committee, opened the forum by presenting an historical perspective on the struggle for childcare at the University, which has culminated in the current proposal for a flexible child care center.

"We have gotten the support of the Faculty Senate, the unions, the Student Government Association, GSS, and GEO," she said. "We have created momentum in the community. The administration has backed it implicitly by having [Associate Chancellor] Sue Pearson on the [Family Issues] committee. Now all we need is space."

But the testimony of the student parents gave the most insight into the complexity and magnitude of the affordable child care issue.

UMass student Jonny Ziebbel addressed the "dramatic" and immediate need for the proposed flexible childcare center due to welfare cuts in December that will affect many low income students and student parents. He spoke about the obstacles he faced as a single parent and student on welfare.

"Student loans count against you [when you are] on welfare, and food stamps are hard to come by," he said.

According to Ziebbel, he tried to obtain state-issued child care vouchers for his three year old daughter when he decided to become a full time student. But the state stipulated that he must work 20-30 hours a week in order to receive the vouchers, which he was unable to do as a full- time student. Recent legislation was proposed to waive this requirement for full-time students, but Governor Paul Celucci vetoed it.

The personal stories about the sacrifices of student parents were endless. Deborah May spoke about her situation twenty years ago as a divorced single mother who gave up custody of her children to get an education.

"No one should have to make that decision," she said.

Grad student Sarah Cisse explained how she left her four children in New York because she wanted to secure housing for them.

"I was planning to have my children join me here," she said, "but now I feel like this is not going to happen."

School of Education student Jehann El Bsi stressed that the struggle for many student parents is a struggle for survival. Unable to pay her rent because of tuition and child care bills, she was taken to court to be evicted and faced administrative withdrawal. She is now selling her furniture to make payments.

She offered her own solution to the problem. "The University has the ability to fundraise quite successfully. There should be emergency assistance available to students in crisis."

Many of the panel members responded to the student testimony. Vladimir Morales, a member of the Amherst School Committee and the Amherst Town Meeting, encouraged participants to address the situation politically.

"Massachusetts has one of the most draconian welfare laws in the country for such a liberal state," added Ann Ferguson, director of the Woman's Studies Program.

Prof. John Bracey, Secretary of the Faculty Senate, suggested a more immediate solution. At the Faculty Senate meeting later that afternoon, he recommended that the Faculty Senate issue reports on the status of childcare at the University and the impact of welfare reform on low income students. He also urged the faculty members to schedule a number of required general education classes at night and during the winter and summer sessions to accommodate student parents.

"It is extremely difficult for a student who has a child to meet some of the Gen[Ed requirements," he said. "We, as faculty, should make every effort so that all students have a fair chance to take classes."

Chancellor David K. Scott, who attended the Faculty Senate meeting, responded to Prof. Bracey's requests and the GEO/GSS flexible child care campaign.

"We are trying to find an optimized solution to meet the academic needs [of student parents]," he said. "I deeply believe that a quality academic institution must also attend to human issues."

He also issued a plea to the University community "to be patient while we work through this maze of complicated issues."

Hearings bore American public

By Michelle Boorstein
Associated Press

From cartoons to horror movies, stock quotes to Jerry Springer, Americans turned the channel yesterday to watch nearly anything but the marathon impeachment hearings against President Clinton. For some, it was the prospect of listening to Kenneth Starr's all-business monotone for two hours that led them to turn off or turn away. Others said they were beyond fed up with the entire cast of characters.

"I'm sick of it. I don't ever want to see Monica Lewinsky's face anymore — or Bill Clinton's, for that matter," said Cindy Kilroy, who works at the Bowling Center in, of all places, Clinton, N.Y., northwest of Albany.

No one wanted to watch the hearings, so Kilroy flipped back and forth between cartoons and the 1991 horror movie, "Strays," starring Timothy Busfield.

Folks at Ferg's barber shop in downtown Des Moines, Iowa, opted to watch other scandals.

"We turned the TV on to 'Jerry Springer,'" said barber Bruce Fulton. "Ken Starr is boring. They don't have enough votes to impeach, so they're just going through the motions."

Some people gave the hearings a chance, but grew frustrated with the process and changed the channel.

"We watched for a while and finally someone said to put on the weather and the sports. I think it's gotten to the point where people want to drop it," said Cyril Clark, bartender at the 21st Amendment in Boston.

Chuck Cullen, a salesman at the Circuit City in Omaha, Neb., said employees changed the display televisions to the hearings after a customer asked.

"She watched it for a little while, then left. We changed the channel back," he said. The hearing "isn't really a good selling point, you know."

Jetsyn Tache switched the hearings on for the 150 morning exercisers at Gold's Gym in Redondo Beach, Calif.

"The consensus is they look at it as a big joke," said Tache, a salesman at the gym. "They watch for 10 minutes and then walk away. It's like, been there, done that."

Former UM alums speak on legal issues

By Aimee Wallis
Collegian Correspondent

Jan Schlichtmann, a lawyer who tried a case between Woburn residents and W.R. Grace and Beatrice Foods, gave a lecture last night in Mahar Auditorium.

He said the companies in this case preferred to be sued. "Companies would rather have a lawsuit thrown against them than have an open and honest discussion," he said.

The University of Massachusetts alumnus gave the speech before receiving the Eleanor Bateman Alumni Scholar in Residence award for his case of eight Woburn Mass. families versus W.R. Grace and Beatrice Foods contamination to the Woburn water supply.

The case fell into Schlichtmann's lap when Ann Anderson of a small neighborhood in Woburn found that not only did her son have leukemia, but other children in the same neighborhood had developed the same disease. The parents of these children contacted the Environmental Protection Agency(EPA) as well as the Center for Disease Control(CDC) and neither of these organizations had answers.

A few months after the parents contacted these organizations, the EPA announced that the wells were contaminated but they did not have answers as to how or when. With that, Schlichtmann entered the picture not realizing what he was getting into.

Schlichtmann described the case as a "educative process" as he joined the eight families. In the end, Schlichtmann lost the case and flew to Hawaii ashamed and depressed. He returned in 1992 after hearing that the families finally had victory when the companies contaminating the water supply were proven at fault. It was upon returning to his home in Beverly he realized he hadn't lost the case at all. He had become a more successful lawyer.

Before this case, Schlichtmann said he approached a trial by looking for the truth as something "hard and cold like a rock." He said he was a trial lawyer intrigued by the dollar signs, fancy cars and the company of colleagues that came with the occupation of being lawyer.

Today he said he connects the word truth with 'problem solving' and 'unification.' He has learned to only take on cases that entice him and take over both his body and his soul.

The trial caught headlines everywhere when the families, as well as Schlictmann, encouraged the press and media to write 'anything' on the Woburn water supply issue. The families simply wanted to grab the communities attention and let them be aware of what companies can get away with.

Almost all companies would rather be sued than people finding out the truth, Schlichtmann said. Due to this, a law was proposed after the Woburn trial took place, proposing that journalists cannot write about non-fiction unless receiving permission from the persons or companies of which they are writing about. The law was not passed.

"It was a terrible law! If we can't learn, then we are going to die," Schlichtmann said.

The 47-year-old attorney exclaimed that there is more social consciousness about chemicals today than there was during the Woburn case. Due to the media's attention, "A Civil Action," based on Schlichtmann's story was written by Jonathan Harr and was released in 1995. Also, this Christmas, John Travolta plays Schlictmann in the movie, "A Civil Action," based on the Harr's book.

Before his speech, Schlichtmann spoke in a private interview about his days at UMass. He says he learned three things while at UMass and had forgotten them until the memory helped him to overcome his depression and feeling of failure after the Woburn case. The things remembered include: number 1, 'truth.' Number two, "oppose the truth, lies, all sorts and all sizes, lies that distract and deny, that injure and kill." Number three, "Use your soul, no the car or the clothes."

Today, Schlichtmann only takes on cases involving environmental issues. He represents 60 Pittsfield, Mass. and Toms River, NJ residents out of his Andover attorney law office and searches for the 'truth' through problem solving. Schlichtmann will be speaking in a few legal studies classes.

the report are to be published in the registration guide for next semester.

"Our job is to come up with an academic program," he said. "We should vote on it now. [Any other] questions can go to the Provost's Academic Advising Committee. We can take as long as we want to work out the details."

But Student Trustee Eleanor Court pointed out that there was no student representation on the Provost's committee, and expressed frustration and confusion, asking how students should address issues contained in the report.

In particular, Court was concerned about the techniques used to recruit students to the Commonwealth College, and the wording of certain sections of the report, which read: "Commonwealth College will provide assistance to groups of students wishing to remain together in other dorms in the hopes that they will spread the culture of learning communities across the campus," and, "Commonwealth College students will also be encouraged to serve as tutors and mentors for other students on campus, to assist in their learning experience."

Bracey responded by emphasizing that the Senate was only asked to vote on the academic requirements outlined in the report, and suggested that the Faculty Senate was not the proper forum to discuss student concerns about other non- academic matters.

Prof. Brian O'Connor, Faculty delegate to the Board of Trustees, suggested an amendment to the motion that would clarify what the Senate was voting on, "to appease student concern and confusion."

The Senate then passed the motion to approve the requirements for the Commonwealth College as recommended by the Academic Matters Council, with Prof. O'Connor's amendment.

After the meeting, Court was approached by many faculty and staff members, including Director of the Honors Program Linda Nolan, who promised to establish a task force to deal with student concerns.

"I think in the end, things were cleared up a bit," Court said, "but the motion, as it originally stood, was not clear."

She emphasized that the Commonwealth College "can really be a great asset if brought to campus in the right way."

But, she added, "There are definitely some major concerns that I have with the wording of this report... Some of it is insulting to me as a student."

Where Art Thou?

Practical philosophy... Does that phrase strike you as somewhat oxymoronic? If it does, no one should cast stones at you. Anyone who has experienced the "modern university" has experienced the fruitless meandering of "un-practical" philosophy as well, both in and out of the classroom.

However, don't pick up stones to cast at your friendly neighborhood philosophy professor just yet. He or she is not alone to blame for your experience with philosophy. In fact you are most likely the guilty culprit. I use you in an inclusive sense; I include myself as well.

Most know what philosophy is, and that a "philo" — "sopher" is a "lover" of "wisdom." A true lover of wisdom seeks out truth — he or she longs for it. He or she does not love in the overly romanticized Titanic way, but in a way that can be quite foreign to Hollywood. He or she is committed to finding wisdom, to finding truth, even if the cost is life itself (The cost of life means day to day pleasures the "puppy lover" of wisdom is not willing to give up). He or she chooses to love wisdom, just as a woman married to her husband for fifty years chooses to love him, even though the butterflies have long gone extinct.

> "What is truth?' The question and the answers it provokes can be legion."
> Clint Hardesty

Do you love wisdom? Are you trying to find truth? Does it concern you at all? These are good questions we should all be asking ourselves. However, sometimes when I look out upon the "marketplace" of ideas we call the University, I realize truth just isn't a top seller. Often, we opt for the ideas that are convenient, or for the ones that make us happy, or even the ones that are popular, rather than those that are true.

"What is truth?" The question and the answers it provokes can be legion. For now, let's borrow a sort of Aristotelian definition: truth is that which corresponds to reality. If I say I am a duck, then I am saying something false. Simple yet profound. No matter what you believe about the issue, no matter how you feel, you cannot change the fact that I am not a duck. Mere whims and fancies do not alter reality (I urge you to investigate this question further).

As we each wrestle with the issues which are so prevalent in our society, the issues that mold humankind, one would hope that we would seek the truth, but so often we do not. Many times we are swept away by the tides of emotion, into thoughts and arguments that not only make no sense but are absurd because we do not take the time to think. We let our professors, our leaders, and our peers spoon-feed us misinformation, and we gobble it up because we are too lazy to feed ourselves.

Allow me to use as an example a most important and controversial issue — abortion. Have you really taken the time to examine the arguments on both sides? Why do you believe what you believe about the issue? Do you realize that if the pro-choicers are correct, then women are in danger of losing the right to govern their own bodies? And if the pro-lifers are correct, then millions of "people" are being slaughtered every year. An important issue, is it not? Should we answer this question with our emotions, or with reason? Do we care what the truth really is?

How about another controversial and important topic — does God exist? If He does, what is He like? If He does exist, your beliefs about Him can neither alter his existence or change what, in reality, He is like. If God doesn't exist, then all of your desires and wishful thinking cannot bring Him to be. God is nothing more than an imaginary figurehead that provides you comfort.

Where art thou, O Socrates? How we desperately need you to challenge our fuzzy thinking, to jar us out of our mental and moral laziness. If only we could see you roaming the campus, prodding us with your incessant questioning until we realize "we know nothing" because we think we already know everything. If only we could bump into you at the Bluewall while you're drinking coffee and eating cookies on your break from helping us see our inconsistencies. If only you would barge into our classrooms uninvited, and remove the irrelevancy and un-practical philosophy, casting it down into the dregs where it belongs.

How long could you, Socrates, make it on our campus? How long would the administration allow you, a trouble maker, to wreak havoc on our beloved institution? How long would it be before we made you drink hemlock because you are "introducing new gods and corrupting our youth?"

Help us to take the time to think about the thoughts and ideas that can both enlighten us and threaten us. We need someone to "awaken the sleeper" to rouse us out of our mental death.

Are you willing to think? Are you willing to wake up?

All I needed to know

Seeing as we just passed the halfway point of the semester, I decided that it might be a good idea to see what exactly I have learned since I enrolled at good old UMass. As a freshman, I will confess that I was a little more than naive when I entered the University, and I figure it would be a good idea to examine whether this had changed or not.

I've learned that man's capacity for stupid, impulsive actions while he is under the influence of alcohol outweighs man's capacity for similar actions when he is influenced by valor, courage, fear, honor, hate, or passion.

> "One of the most interesting things that I learned was that (and here is a quote from everyone's favorite cross-carrying Jesus person) I am 'Useless.'"
> Chris Collins

I've learned that not only do people exist who would like nothing better than the destruction of the United States, but that there is a also group of people who oppose the existence of an organization that would like nothing better than the destruction of the United States.

Another thing that I learned this semester was how the lovely people at MIT can ruin the old rhyme: "How much wood would a woodchuck chuck if a woodchuck could chuck wood?" This question has remained for ages, until some punk kid at MIT decided to measure the volume of a woodchuck's stomach and figure out the answer. The answer (realize that this question was left unanswered by all of our best thinkers — Plato, DaVinci, Decartes, and Reagan) is two cords. Disappointing isn't it? Another childhood question answered.

One of the most interesting things that I learned was that (and here is a quote from everyone's favorite cross-carrying Jesus person) I am "Useless." For a while, this knowledge upset me, but then I think of Norman Brinker and everything falls into place.

What do you mean that you don't know who Mr. Brinker is? Come on folks, get with the program. Mr. Brinker is the businessman who invented the salad bar. When I look at the great contribution that he made to our world, I have to believe that no matter what other people tell me, I can make a difference, just like Mr. Norman Brinker.

I learned that my friends were not lying when they said that the food here was less than four star fare. Nor were they kidding when they told me that sleep becomes more important than food when food quality goes down the proverbial tube.

On the plus side, I have learned that not only do the people at La Cucina di Pinocchio make a mean calzone, but they are willing to bring it directly to my dorm on the hill, which is something rather amazing if you ask me.

This semester I learned that Michael Moore is a vulgar individual. I also learned that he is an extremely funny, vulgar person which made going to see him speak all the more worthwhile.

I learned that jeans can be worn for a couple of weeks without washing, if you are careful about what you spill on them.

I learned that email is one of the mixed blessings like Nuclear energy and government.

I learned that frisbee is the ultimate metaphor for life and that we should worship the little plastic discs as if they allowed us to tap into a spiritual oneness that other material objects can't.

I learned that each class essentially costs us 56 dollars (I saw it on a bulletin board so it must be true), so that when you sleep through one you are guaranteed to feel good and rested because it was an expensive nap.

I learned that the most common answer on a multiple choice test is which ever one I didn't choose.

I learned that walking up and down the hill becomes more and more annoying everyday.

I learned that I hate being awakened by people, drunk or sober, yelling outside of my room at three in the morning.

I learned that people's soap and other bodily care products are left in the bathroom for reasons that I could never dream of figuring out.

I learned that there is one lady who is always representing the Hare Krishna in the Campus Center and that they always have a sign that says: Free Cookies.

I learned that Bluewall cookies are addictive and that they put just a little too much cinnamon in their apple cider.

And finally, I learned that being a writer is certainly a lot more work than tossing out random ideas strung together with some vague unifying theme such as "what I learned during this semester."

Holiday War

I think that we should blow up Iraq. A war would be great. It would be the perfect thing to stimulate the economy right before the Christmas shopping season.

Think about it. All our industry could get back to doing what it did best during the Reagan years, namely making bombs, guns and high tech tracking systems so that we can annihilate all our enemies. This would provide our country with thousands of quality, high-paying jobs. Then families could afford to run out and buy their kids the newest toy. (Remember "Tickle me Elmo?") Thus, war would generate incredible revenue in the private sector.

The Dow Jones Industrial average has been hovering close to an index of 9000 but cannot seem to rise above it for any extended period of time. Forget about cutting interest rates to help the economy because those numbers. With a few Cruise missiles, we can have the population doubling in only 47.6 years.

> "I know that I am neglecting the morality of war. Sure people die, but that is kind of the point."
> Matt Frascella

And think about CNN. They are drooling at the prospect of another military action in Iraq. I can speak from experience that there is nothing better than sitting at home watching objects and people blow up on TV. It is better than a Bruce Willis movie because the explosions are real. Anyway, you know Ted Turner must be hurting now that the NBA is not playing. The NBA and war are the only two reasons that people even watch Turner television, but war is better than an NBA contest. An NBA game only has four quarters, twelve minutes a piece, but war goes on for days or even weeks and doesn't stop for sunset, labor talks, or any Sabbath.

Also, the greatest period of economic prosperity in this nation's history was following World War II when we had just shown the world who the boss was. (And it wasn't Tony Danza.)

But ever since those pesky Communists could no longer keep up in the arms race, we have been left with no competitors, and now all we have is Iraq. But Saddam Hussein only talks tough behind our backs, and when it comes down to it, he always stands down.

Personally I am sick of it. We are Americans. Nobody does that to us and gets away with it. We thought we taught him a lesson before, but he still hasn't learned. He is just as smug as ever in his big palace.

Iraq is like a younger sibling; they see how far they can push us until we snap, and I think time has come. Let's release our full arsenal; planes, tanks, battleships, missiles, bombs, and everything else. And this time we won't stop until there is nothing left except rubble. Bush couldn't finish the job, but maybe Clinton can.

UMass can even get into the act of supporting the war. We can have "No DC Mondays" where we can skip a delicious meal and donate it to our troops. We can even send them some buses and vans to transport troops and munitions. We have so many of them anyway that I can't even cross a street without almost getting run down.

The draft is another touchy issue, but I will be the first to support it. War builds character. It is an on-the-job experience and a trip to an exotic land all rolled up into one. I have never been to the Middle East, but I would love to trot around in camouflage with a full load of guns, grenades and land mines. After all, I grew up with G.I. Joe (Destro was pretty slick with his shiny head), and I always thought that it looked cool to be a special forces soldier, narrowly escaping the bullets of my foes.

I know that I am neglecting the morality of war. Sure people die, but that is kind of the point. Some population control now and then isn't that bad. I heard some statistic that the world's population doubles every 40 years. Overpopulation is becoming a serious issue. We need to attack that problem head-on. American-style and downsize

So once Iraq is completely leveled, we can proceed to Americanize the Middle East. We can bring in capitalism because after all, there are so few places left that don't already have it. The first thing we should do is build a Disney store and right next to it we can put in a McDonalds. That would be a big American rubber stamp on the area. Next we roll in the heavy oil industry so that no country can threaten to take away our oil ever again.

Exxon could build a huge amusement park in tribute to our new "manifest destiny." They could have an oil log flume, but the highlight would be the Exxon Valdez petting zoo complete with a "name-that-animal prize giveaway." It would be fun for the whole family.

So, in conclusion I would like to say that in my objective survey of war, I have found a plethora of points in support of our action in the Middle East and no points against it. War benefits us immeasurably and will make the holiday season a much more enjoyable time. So while I eat my turkey and watch Barry Sanders this Thanksgiving, hopefully I will be able to change the channel and see the computerized image of a missile hitting an airfield and hear the calm words of some CNN reporter broadcasting live from Baghdad. Happy Thanksgiving Saddam.

Hewitt's "Last Summer" sequel should get the hook

COURTESY JAMES BRIDGES

Jennifer Love Hewitt has good reason to be scared, she has the lead role in the dumb backfest sequel I Still Know What You Did Last Summer.

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Staff

I STILL KNOW WHAT YOU DID LAST SUMMER
Directed by Danny Cannon
with Jennifer Love Hewitt, Brandy, and Freddy Prinze Jr.
Playing at Hampshire Mall Cinemas

If there was a law that movie titles had to tell you exactly what the movie was about, then this one would be called Jennifer Love Hewitt in Little T-shirts. Showing off the "Party of Five" star's body seems to be the only thing the filmmakers are interested in, because they certainly don't seem to be interested in making a good movie, or even in scaring people. It's not just a badly put together movie, it's no fun.

The movie follows Jennifer Love Hewitt's tormented character and some of her pretty friends on a vacation to a tiny Caribbean island. Needless to say, the vacation goes horribly wrong when that guy with the hook shows up. Mayhem follows.

Scream, which gave birth to this monster, was the first of the recent cycle of teen-horror movies and was a pretty good movie, if snotty. It was unusually talky, light on its feet, and unpredictable. How quickly that mild innovation in the horror movie genre was bogged down with paint-by-the-numbers imitators I Still Know What You Did Last Summer is only the latest pretender, following in the footsteps of the equally hollow I Know What You Did Last Summer and this summer's Dangerous Behavior.

You can almost imagine the movie execs, planning this one in a dark room, saying something like: "We can do Scream. Just throw some young kids in there, put some complicated sentences in their mouths, and have a bad dude chase them around." I Still Know What You Did Last Summer was not made to frighten people; it was made to separate teenagers from their lawnmowing money.

The cynical goals of the movie would be mildly forgivable if it was at all entertaining or interesting. It's not. The set- ups are excruciating and obvious, every plot twist predictable and the acting isn't even overstated enough to be enjoyably hammy. Part of the problem is that the movie toys with the theme of guilt for half-an-hour or so, bringing up serious ideas of vengeance and forgiveness that it simply forgets about. It has too much dark emotion to be mindless, and too many stupid ideas to be taken seriously. In other words, it fails on nearly every level.

The movie's only high point is its often disarmingly intense photography. The lurid colors and overwhelming shadows are the only part of the movie that could be called "nightmarish." Any amount of terror achieved by the photography is, however, immediately negated by Love Hewitt's smooth, anonymous performance. She's too weak of a presence to embody those nightmares. Consequently, the good photography seems artificial and out of place.

Hopefully there will be no third sequel. Someone should tell Jennifer Love Hewitt to give the Gordon's fisherman guy his fishsticks back so he will put down the hook and stop chasing her around. D

Norton fights for his "non-Kaye" version of American History X

By Mark Kennedy
Associated Press

The actor knows it's only a matter of time before it pops up — yet again — in a discussion of his new film. And when it does, his jaw hardens ever so slightly.

Who really made "American History X"?

The question is unavoidable when dealing with a film that generated one of the ugliest post-production struggles in recent years, as the star dueled the director for final control. The apparent loser, first-time director Tony Kaye, is so embittered by the experience that he vows never again to speak to New Line Cinema or Norton, whose name induces a flood of expletives.

"I provided him an ambiance and a stage and the freedom for him to do his best work," says Kaye. "And he repaid me by stabbing me in the back a million times."

Norton pauses before responding. "The best thing about making a film is that they're collaborative," he says wearily. "And the worst thing about making them is that they're collaborative."

In other words, welcome to the jungle — Hollywood-style. It began with a gritty, profane script: A reformed white Nazi skinhead, freed from prison after murdering two black teen-agers, tries to prevent his younger brother from following in his destructive goose-steps.

"The first time I ever read it, I put it down and said, 'That's a tragedy,'" says Norton. "In a classic, dramatic structural sense, it's a drama with a prescriptive lesson. Here's a guy who comes fully to understand what his flaw has been, and yet it's too late to accept the consequences."

Norton signed on. Thanks to a steady, protein-rich diet, he gained 30 pounds of muscle, shaved his head, hung out with skinheads and stuck an enormous black swastika over his heart.

"The big challenge of this for me was to introduce a character who is nightmarishly awful, who is coming back at you in slow motion and you're just going: 'That is the worst nightmare! That is evil!'" says Norton.

"By the end, though, I wanted the audience not to be able to use the word evil because he's too completely humanized in a sad way. I wanted people to feel pain — emotional impact, maybe even empathy — over the fact that this character has fallen so hard."

So far, so good. The film showcases Norton at his sociopathic best, a performance that recalls his riveting debut as the angelic teen-ager on trial for murder in 1996's "Primal Fear." Norton beat out 2,000 other unknowns for the "Primal Fear" role after Leonardo DiCaprio turned it down, and won a Golden Globe and an Academy Award nomination. Norton's unexpected flashes of savagery impressed critics.

"On some level, you can only pull that off one time," Norton says. "I had a field day. It's exciting to know that you're the best person for it because no one knows who you are and you have that card up your sleeve."

After that, Norton did a U-turn, playing — and singing — a goofy role in Woody Allen's "Everyone Says I Love You," tackling the roles of an unimposing lawyer in "The People vs. Larry Flynt," and a hard-core gambler in this fall's "Rounders." Norton was soon seen as a breakthrough star, and touted as the next Sean Penn or maybe even the future Dustin Hoffman. Directors flooded his agent with scripts.

"What lifts him into the stratosphere and creates those moments that are just unforgettable on screen is the depth of his concentration and intelligence," says producer John Morrissey. "His focus is total."

Norton, a Maryland-born, Yale University-educated preppie who speaks fluent Japanese, spices up interviews with mouth-twisting terms like "realm of theatricality," "hyperbolic" and "behavioral naturalism." But he's also painfully thoughtful and reserved.

"Look, I just feel that sharing intimate elements of my personal life gets them trivialized and oversimplified," he says. "I don't want everything of value in my life to become an anecdote."

That wouldn't be easy once he wrapped on his "Uber-neo-Nazi." Controversy, of course, is often a marketing gold mine, and "American History X" has generated a mountain of buzz for a film that cost only $10 million. It just wasn't the kind of buzz the studio was expecting.

The trouble began after Kaye, 46, delivered his cut of the film to New Line Cinema. Even though it reportedly scored well with screening audiences, Kaye was unsatisfied. He asked for — and was granted — time to make a second, shorter cut. When it arrived, the studio thought it lacked the necessary emotional punch and permitted Norton — at age 29 and lacking any directorial training — to get his own crack at it in the editing bay. Kaye was incensed. He publicly renounced the re-edited version in a campaign that included full-page ads in Daily Variety and the Hollywood Reporter lampooning the studio and the star.

Relenting, New Line permitted Kaye a number of weeks to come up with an acceptable version of his film. When the deadline elapsed, however, Kaye showed up empty-handed. New Line, tired of waiting and having already missed several delivery dates, decided to release the so-called "Norton cut." Kaye demanded that his name be removed from the final product. The studio declined.

Kaye, an award-winning advertising director, says the "crippled version" of his film is a "huge embarrassment." He holds Norton mainly responsible.

"This guy basically destroyed my opportunity of debuting with a pretty... good film, which is quite rare," says Kaye. "I don't know if he did it knowingly or if he really is a fool. He reduced it into a performance. That's really all that's left."

Norton, who insists his version of the film changed Kaye's original vision by "no more than 5 percent," says he's more shocked that the studio indulged the director for so long.

"He has whipped up an imagined chasm in his mind that's way beyond what's really there," Norton says of Kaye. "I think that's a function of him having a letting-go anxiety."

For Norton, the ruckus is overshadowing the hours of grueling shoots, the physical burdens of transforming his body, the weeks spent researching, debating and sharpening his dialogue.

"It is a distraction and it is unfortunate," he says. "The thing you absolutely learn in any kind of art is that once you let it go, it has a life completely of its own. It's not yours any more. It's for people to respond to, to interact with — that's the beauty of it all."

Christopher Reeve returns to acting in modern Rear Window

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

Christopher Reeve was an actor for a quarter-century. Then, three years after breaking his neck and still paralyzed from the neck down, he was acting again.

"Just like getting back on a bicycle," he says of his return.

Reeve's comeback project: "Rear Window," which he shot last summer. Daryl Hannah also stars in what is billed as "a modern update" of the story that inspired Alfred Hitchcock's 1954 classic. It airs Sunday at 9 p.m. on ABC.

The two "Rear Windows" are substantially different, as different as, say, Hannah from Grace Kelly, the original's co-star. But each adopts the viewpoint of an inadvertent witness to a crime (or WAS there a crime?), of a man in a wheelchair struggling to confirm suspicions that eventually imperil him.

"But instead of Jimmy Stewart with a broken leg — who could get up and hop around if he had to — you put a severely disabled person in the same kind of jeopardy," Reeve notes, "and you raise the stakes."

Speaking with a reporter in the sun-drenched office of his Bedford, N.Y., home, Reeve at age 46 looks good. Despite his body's utter stillness in his high-tech wheelchair, he commands an expressive face and a voice that, while gravelly, flows without the frequent halts for air that, as recently as two years ago, meant anything he said was parceled out in fragments.

Now, fluidly, Reeve does a little boasting about his fitness regimen and its promising results. For instance, in a recent bone-density scan to test for osteoporosis, "I beat the national average by 20 percent," he reports. "I'm just as healthy as I was the day of the accident."

The character Reeve plays in "Rear Window," architect Jason Kemp, shares his hearty outlook. This, says the actor, is one reason he wanted to make the film (he was also executive producer): Jason, left a quadriplegic after a car crash, refuses to give up.

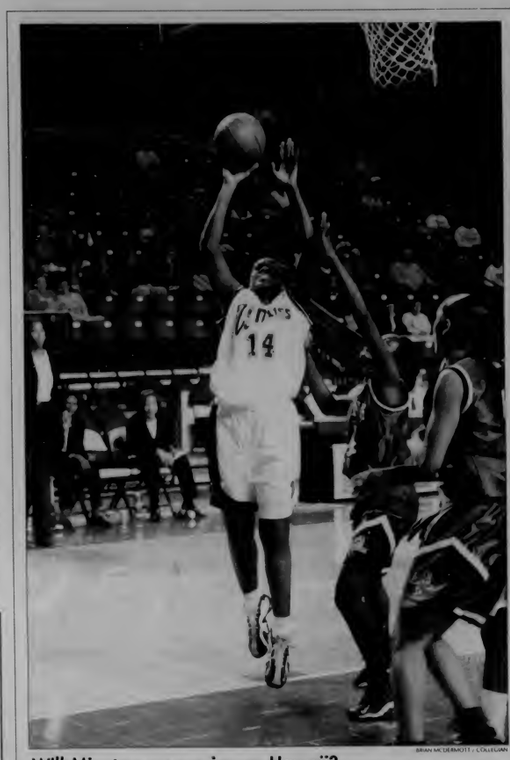
Such heroism, of course, is what Reeve has radiated almost from the moment of his dreadful tumble from a horse in May 1995. Since then, he has become a fund-raiser, political arm-twister and unrepentant noodge in the service of spinal-cord research — and of finding the cure Reeve insists is just a few years away.

"I've been making a lot of noise for the last three years," he sums up his labors. "I've been in a lot of peoples' faces."

Reeve has carried out this starring role with tenacity and grace before a rapt global audience that understands his victories are theirs. But will the latest victory in Reeve's real-life drama — his improbable return to acting in "Rear Window" — upstage the performance he gives in it? Dismissing his own uniqueness, he replies:

"Watching almost every famous actor, there's a certain amount of time before you're willing to stop thinking about who they are and let their character take you away." An actor's success "depends on the audience's willingness to say, 'OK, I'm going to go with this.' At least, it is when I go to the movies."

But how to judge Reeve's performance apart from his physical limitations? The truth of his portrayal is indisputable, and any able-bodied actor might very well have chosen to play Jason in the same way. But is it valid to credit or criticize Reeve for creative choices imposed on him by the paralysis that another actor in the role would invent? When asked about the reduced set of acting tools now in his possession, Reeve replies, "This character doesn't have as many tools, either. If I had been on my feet," he reasons, "playing this part would have meant a research assignment. But I come to the part already with the given circumstance in place." Thus does Reeve transform a hindrance into a head start.



He filmed "Rear Window" during a grueling 25-day shoot at an office park in the nearby city of Yonkers. Jason's swanky loft was installed in one building that faced another, where apartments on three floors were constructed for Jason to spy into.

"I was worried that only acting with my voice and my face, I might not be able to communicate effectively enough to tell the story," Reeve acknowledges. "But I was surprised to find that if I really concentrated, and just let the thoughts happen, that they would read on my face. With so many close-ups, I knew that my every thought would count."

He cites a moment when Jason, stationed at his living room window, gazes on a beautiful woman across the way.

"At first he smiles, but then you see this pure longing on his face. You see his pain: How part of his life is gone for good. It was just me thinking those thoughts, and the camera picked them up."

Yes, it did. Powerfully. But might Reeve have been drawing on thoughts of his own deprivations?

From the desk of Joe Mullen
Head Coach

I would like to take this opportunity to thank those of you who attended our hockey games versus Maine last weekend. In particular, I would like to recognize the fans sitting in the student section. Your enthusiasm and verve did not go unnoticed and played a major role in our success. As a result of your hard work, the Mullins Center has quickly become a nightmare for visiting teams. So please accept my deepest thanks and I hope to see you at Saturday night's game versus Union.

Union stunned them," Mallen said. "They have decent players and will give us a test. We just need to put ourselves in a position to win the game."

On offense, the Minutemen will need to turn to some of the usual scorers, but this team really doesn't have a usual scorer. They have received scoring from a variety of players thus far this season. Jeff Blanchard carries five points into the game with Union. He has one goal and four assists. The other scoring has coming from players including defenseman Dean Stork and Chris Brannen. The forwards have also contributed with scoring from Nathan Sell and Darcy King — but no player has broken out in the scoring column for UMass.

Between the pipes for UMass — no one can doubt that Markus Helanen's performance has been nothing short of NHL caliber. The Finnish keeper stopped 87 shots last weekend against Maine, while receiving recognition as Hockey East Player of Week and United States College Hockey on-line Player of the Week. But his quality net minding goes deeper than last weekend, in all seven outings he has only had one shaky performance.

The question for Mallen is when do you give this workhorse a rest, and let a capable Mike Johnson get some time?

"I thought a lot about how much Markus has played, but he has played well. Mike [Johnson] might just have to wait his turn like Markus did last year. We want to go with our best guy. I also have like what I have seen from Mike," Mallen said.

Union is the last game of a seven-game homestand for the Minutemen, and looks like it could be a must win — in a season full of seemingly must-win games for UMass. The Union game on Saturday, and the Vermont contest away on Tuesday, will provide UMass with two golden opportunities to reach .500 before taking on next tough challenge at Colorado College on Nov. 28.

"A lot of people have been talking about a lot of games — as must win games. Playoff games and games to get into playoffs — those are must wins. I don't want to put to much pressure on these guys. I just want them to stay focused because the guys know there are no easy teams in Division I," Mallen said.

Women's hockey is ready to go

By Melissa Sherman
Collegian Correspondent

In a fundraiser for the club, the Massachusetts women's ice hockey team will face off against the UMass Police Department this Sunday at 2 p.m. at the Mullins Center practice rink.

The women's team is of club status, which means they have to pay for the majority of expenses from their own pocket. Hockey is an expensive sport, and the women have a very high budget. Last year they spent $10,000, which included ice time, equipment and uniforms, officials, tournament expenses and buses for away games.

To cover costs each player pays $75 dues, and has relied on fundraisers such as selling t-shirts and candy bars. They also earn money cleaning the Mullins Center after events and they receive some donations, and volunteer in the community. They recently participated in "Make a Difference Day" in Northampton, where the girls helped build and clean a park. In the past, they have contributed time and energy into such charities as Habitat for Humanity and Fill a bus.

When Bob Waskiewicz of the UMass Police department learned of the women's predicament, he decided to help them out. Waskiewicz is a member of the Hampshire County Sheriff's ice hockey team which plays the Hampden County team each winter to benefit the TRIAD program. Waskiewicz pulled his team together a little early this year for yet another good cause.

"Its hard for these women to be expected to spend this kind of money on top of other college expenses. I figured our team can help them out," he said.

On Waskiewicz's roster there are 19 officers from UMass, Amherst, Hadley, Shutesbury, the Hampshire County Sheriff's Department and the state police. They also have one Amherst firefighter. All of the players are men, some of whom play regularly, and others of whom do not. Said Waskiewicz, who feels that it will be an interesting game.

"A lot of the women are better then the guys," said Waskiewicz, who feels that it will be an interesting game.

The 22 women on the team practice five days a week and are led by captains Molly Sherman, Jenna Nolan and Janine Denoncourt.

"We have a young team but we're good, we are getting more support then in the past, were playing more competitive schools and improving as a team," Sherman said.

The women are showing the UMass community that they are serious about their sport, hoping one day to attain a varsity status. Last year, they finished second at the Women's Ice Hockey Club Team Regional Tournament and fourth at Nationals in Lake Placid, ending the season with a 13-6-2 record.

Many of the women have been playing for years, and there is no lack of talent or experience. Nolan has been playing on boys' teams since she was four.

"My mom made me quit when I got on an older team with my brother who was 6 feet 2 and 200 pounds," she said. "That's when I found a women's team to play with."

Tickets are $3 and will be available the day of the game at the Mullins Center practice rink. Both teams are excited about the game, but neither would predict the outcome.

UM looks to stay undefeated

UMass swimming uses depth for great start to season

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's swimming team looks to avenge the men's basketball team loss to St. John's by traveling to Jamaica, N.Y. for a meet with the Red Storm.

The Minutewomen will look to take the record to 5-0 when they meet the Red Storm on Saturday. In order for UMass to win, they will need a complete team performance. The depth for UMass will need to shine through.

UMass is coming off a huge comeback win over Boston University. The BU meet came down to the 400 free style relay, and a pair of freshman, a sophomore and a veteran junior came through to beat the Terriers. Anne Dettloff, Marci Hupp, Andrea Kazanjian and Julie Dragan finished in first place in a time of 3:35.39 to win the meet.

"St. John's has two really good divers and three or four very talented swimmers, but not a lot of depth. I think our strength is depth — that's where I think we can do our damage," UMass coach Bob Newcomb said. "Our 400 relay team did a great job. They all swam 4.5 seconds faster then they ever had before. They really stepped it up."

The BU win will be a big motivational factor for the Minutewomen when they take on the Red Storm. They will head into the meet on an emotional high from the win in Boston.

"I think for this team, which is made up of mostly freshman and sophomores, the BU win was a big win. But as the coach, I hope they can come out and swim with the same intensity that they swam with in the BU meet," Newcomb said. "They also need to know that the strength of our team is the depth and that we need everyone to step it up every meet."

Another test for the Minutewomen will being in the diving portion of the meet, where St. John's puts fourth two solid divers. The Minutewomen boast three good divers of their own. Kim Schadt currently holds the best score in the three- meter diving competition at 234.00, while Robin Velona set the best mark in the 1-meter diving competition this season against BU with a score of 234.55.

"It will be a good challenge for our divers, and the good thing about our divers — as with the rest of our team— not just one stands out. Any one of them can step up and win either event," Newcomb said.

The Minutewomen will also count on a solid performance from Dettloff, who holds the best time in the 100 free (53.81), the 200 free (1:56.78), the 500 free (5:09.67) and the 1000 free (10:33.13). Julie Alexander and Elizabeth Risotto will also be counted on. Alexander in the breaststroke and Risotto in the backstroke, where they each hold the top times thus far this season.

Rebecca Hunnewell has also recorded the second best times in both backstroke events, as well as the second best time in the 500 free. Sophomore Sarah Newell has also been consistent for the Minutewomen in the breaststroke. She has swam with times of 1:10.42 and 2:29.17 in the 100-meter and 200-meter breast.

"We have a lot of good swimmers, but we have so many swimmers that take seconds, thirds and fourths for this team," Newcomb said.

Former UM greats look on

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Former George Washington and current St. John's coach Mike Jarvis did not bear the only familiar face when the Massachusetts men's basketball team traveled to Jamaica, N.Y. Wednesday night.

Hoping to catch a glimpse of the program which they once led to the Final Four, former UMass coach John Calipari and former players Dana Dingle and Carmelo Travieso were on hand, and were also more than willing to look back upon the glory days of old... and offer a bit of advice on how the Minutemen can reach their own.

After leading UMass to the Final Four in 1996, Calipari was quickly grabbed by an NBA franchise. In only two seasons with the team, his New Jersey Nets have gone from cellar dwellers of the NBA Atlantic Division to legitimate candidates to win it. But until the league settles its lockout, Calipari has plenty of time to engage in his true passion— college basketball.

"I went to a lot of college practices and it was great because it was the first time that I've ever had the chance to see other practices, so that was fun," Calipari said. "If you think about it, I've been a head coach for 10 years, and never once have been to someone else's practices."

As far as his former UMass program is concerned, Calipari feels his successor Bruiser Flint has the Minutemen on the right track and has the players capable of leaving a mark on the college basketball map.

"They still defend, they still rebound, and he's got them playing hard," Calipari said of Flint. "I think he's doing a terrific job. At the practice I saw, he was great. With Lari, it was like when we had Lou Roe and Marcus Camby. You know, you're going to go as they go."

Carmelo Travieso

Although its been almost two seasons since he last wore the Maroon and White, Travieso still takes a great interest in watching the Minutemen play.

"I work in the area, so I thought I'd come down and check out how UMass is doing... I'm working and I'm playing a little bit. I still play in Puerto Rico," said Travieso. "I'm working at the commodities exchange. I went into finance. That's what I like to do. I want to one day be a broker."

He also recalled the last time UMass took part in the Preseason N.I.T., when the Minutemen upset the No. 1 ranked North Carolina Tar Heels in the semi-final game.

"It does [bring back memories of my freshman year] when we played against North Carolina," he said. "This team's very similar to us. We had a lot of big guys. These guys just have to work hard and get better every day. They've got a lot of talent, they've got a lot of big guys too."

Dingle was not quick to forget his former playing days, and offered a few words of advice for the current UMass players.

"It was the miracle on 34th, that's what they called it. We were underdogs by 30 points, and we just came back and played like we did back in the days when it was 'Refuse to Lose.' Anything can happen," Dingle said of the UNC victory, hinting that the current players are capable of reaching the same heights. "[If I could give the them advice, I'd tell them] to just play defense and play hard. Let the game come to them, don't try to find it."

UM men set for season

Yarworth hopes for 4th straight win

By Jimmy Chen
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's swimming team still hasn't figured out a way to lose for the past two years.

And now coming off a win over George Washington last year in the conference championship, the squad is on a 17-meet consecutive win streak and is hungry for more. However, this weekend, that streak may be challenged when UMass travels to New York and faces a back-to-back dual meet scheduled against Columbia and St. John's.

The Lions, with most of their swimmers coming back this year, came the closest to beating the Minutemen last year, losing the meet 106 to 137. This Saturday, they shall have a chance to redeem themselves by trying to upset the defending A-10 champion in their own pool.

Just as Columbia is looking for a revenge, St. John's has suffered a similar fate in the past, as it points its finger for fault towards the Minutemen. The Red Storm can still remember vividly the feelings that they had when they left Amherst last winter after getting blown away by the Minutemen, 72 to 171.

This weekend, they will be ready and rested in New York where they go head to head with the UMass team that will be coming off a tough meet the night previous. In addition, the recorded times for their races have been looking very solid, shaping the whole confrontation into a really close match.

For UMass, there is a lot to prove too. Coming off 3-0 and taking a scare from Boston University last weekend, the team tries hard to top the feats of last year's squad while it looks for its fourth straight A-10 title. They also know that teams will be coming after them and they have to stand up to the test, just like this weekend when St. John's and Columbia each takes their respective chance to knock off the king.

"There is really not much to say. We are looking forward to two strong [and] competitive meets," said UMass junior leading diver Ed Hefferon, who posted a remarkable score of 304.60 last Sunday— the third highest in school history— which also helped him to qualify for NCAA. "Pretty much every meet was taken the same way seriously... we got out there, trying to have some fun and do our best."

"The reason I scheduled back to back meets, . . really doesn't have to do with the dual meet season. It has to do with preparing for championships," last year's A-10 coach of the year Russ Yarworth (172-43) said. "What I am trying to do is to prepare the kids to swim fast a couple days in a row and in a competitive format."

"I'd love for a win, but that is not a paramount importance because what we are trying to do is to prepare for the conference meet at the end of the year," Yarworth said. "I want them to swim tough. If they swim tough, I am happy. If they don't swim tough, they will hear from me."

Yarworth is keeping low key and the team is not at full strength yet. Two key swimmers, sophomore Billy Hunter and junior Geoff Gear, who will add strengths to fly, freestyle, and breaststroke, are still with the water polo team. Plus, the team has many new faces while a lot of old faces were graduated.

One newcomer that Yarworth doesn't have to worry about is freshman sensation Billy Brown, who just at his third college meet broke two pool records and received an individual victory.

"I am looking forward [to coaching him and for him] to have a good shot at winning the conference in his event," Yarworth said.

In addition to Brown, Yarworth will also receive help from junior standout diver Hefferon, one of the most important piece of the puzzle in searching for Atlantic 10 crown this year. Other key swimmers include junior B.J. Barman in the 1000 free, freshman Ryan Rose in the 50 free, freshman Chris Arsenault in the 100 free, and junior Brian Wisniewski, Brown, Gear, and sophomore Henry Turner in the 200 medley relay team.

With this lineup, hey, maybe winning 31 straight games can be a reality, and maybe the fourth A-10 title doesn't sound so bad.

Kenny said after the URI. "I know they'll fight hard every night, and that's the great thing about this team."

The Minutewomen lead the series between them and both Xavier and Dayton, but suffered losses to both teams earlier this season at Curry Hicks by scores of 3-1.

UMass is looking to not only avenge those early season losses, but to also make a mark for next year.

The same Minutewomen who have been a force for UMass all season will need to come through again this weekend in order for UMass to come up victorious.

UMass will need a solid effort from junior co-captains Kari Hogancamp and Jill Meyers. Hogancamp has been a force to reckon with. She has posted 16 consecutive double-doubles, and will be looking to improve on those numbers this weekend. The Huntington Beach, Calif. native has amassed 1437 defensive digs in her career, and needs only 47 more digs to surpass Leslie Nolan as the career leader in digs at UMass. Hogancamp was also ranked tenth in the nation as of last weekend in the digs. She has tallied 444 digs thus far this season and leads the Atlantic 10 in this category.

Meyers will also need to be at top form for UMass to up end the conference leaders. Meyers also ranks among the top five in 11 categories for her career. She was also able to tally a double-double in the Minutewomens last win over URI. Meyers collected 18 kills and 12 digs along with four blocks.

UMass will also have to count on Rebecca Hasson for blocking in the middle, and for hitting, especially the way she hit against URI. Hasson will need more performances like that for the Minutewomen to come up winners.

UMass will also count on the play of their stellar freshman Heather Holtsberg and Janeen DeMarte.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You're likely to hear form someone today who owes you a great deal. However, you'll be surprised to know he or she now has an offer which can make everything "even Steven."

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Your own curiosity is likely to lead you into a situation that proves to be too much for you, in a relatively short period of time. Back away quickly!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Be courteous at all times today. Be sure to let others know just what you are doing, and why. Be straight with everyone.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You may have a great deal of work to do today, but more importantly, there is a chance to get together with a special friend.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You'll have to work closely with others today to make plans that can hold up to any changes in circumstances later on. Communicate openly.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Seek only those outlets which allow you to behave in a way which feels natural. If it adds to daily stress, it's not for you!

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You're likely to live up to your reputation as a home-lover today. You may even choose to forsake a professional opportunity to stay at home.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Take care that you're not trying to "show off" for someone who is actually better equipped to say and do the right things at this time.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Your deepest feelings are nearing the surface at this time. It's best for you to avoid any situations which may rub you the wrong way.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — It's been a long time since you had the chance to say what is on your mind with no risk of reprisals of any kind. Today, you can really "let go!"

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — A special gathering affords you a rare opportunity to do something that you've been tempted to try for some time. Your support group can help you out.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You're not likely to stop once you get a taste of something you've resisted for some time. Take care you don't lose control and overindulge!

Bruins, Noles set to lose; Williams Heisman caliber

C'mon UCLA, c'mon Kansas State, c'mon Tennessee...

We're creeping towards the utopic finish, three teams undefeated, but only room enough for two in the Tostitos Bowl, er, Fiesta Bowl for the National Championship.

Oh, what to do, what to do, BCS committee? Send a rabid USC fan to take Cade McNown's knees out? Hey, whatever it takes, right?

Brett Mauser on College Football

Maybe they won't even need that. The showdown of showdowns in the PAC-10, USC at UCLA, is on the card for Saturday. Let's forget about the helmets and just play some hard-nosed, I-hate-you-'cause-you-hate-me football.

Last week, the Bruins needed a victory in a big way, and they got it, beating Washington in Washington 36-24. Heading into its two biggest games of the year (home against USC and away at Miami) and on the heels of two squirmy seat-specials in Stanford and Oregon State, all coach Bob Toledo needed was a confidence booster. And he got it.

It looks like McNown will only be a spectator at the Downtown Athletic Club when the Heisman Trophy is handed out to Texas' Ricky Williams (oooh, bold), but his team is undefeated and looking for its first National Title in a long, long time.

UCLA is parked at second place in the BCS rankings, but can't put it in cruise control quite yet. With third-place Kansas State looming, the Bruins need a convincing victory in one of their two final games, allowing them enough leverage in the standings if the Wildcats beat up Missouri real good this weekend, which is quite possible.

They might want to look to Miami, though, because with bowl bids and bragging rights on the line, the Trojans found their missing link after dropping their third game on the year, a 17-13 decision to Oregon, in freshman quarterback Carson Palmer.

Palmer is much more of a traditional dropback quarterback than his predecessor Mike Van Raaphorst. Van Raaphorst was much too mistake-prone for USC coach Paul Hackett's liking. Standing tall, though, is Palmer, who in two starts has tossed only one interception in leading the Trojans to victories over the Huskies and Stanford.

The Trojans come in with the conference's second best pass defense, and used that to beat Washington, as Antuan Simmons picked two of Brock Huard's four interceptions and brought them all the way back for 12. That'll kill ya.

UCLA needs a standout game from running back Jermaine Lewis. Ball control will be huge for both squads, as USC does not have the offense, and UCLA needs to avoid the turnover column. Big-game jitters oughta bug Palmer, but only for a little while. He's prime-time.

Getting 6 1/2, though, I like USC in UCLA's backyard. A BCS committee member's dream, indeed. USC 31, UCLA 27.

Mauser's Toilet Bowl Picks of the Week:

Last week: 1-2
Season: 76-17

Hey, while we're talking rivalries, let's talk Florida/Florida State. Deep in the heart of Florida, what people really want to see is Bobby Bowden and Steve Spurrier go at it in a cage match. But at 3:30 tomorrow, they'll renew the most renowned rivalry in all of college football, at least recently.

The players will stay in tonight, playing College Football '99 or whatever on some system, hitting "A" a million times to get to themselves, and then making sure that they make the big hit or the big catch. And then jumping up and goin' "yeah, that'll be me tomorrow, man, you just wait." Confidence is a plus, though.

It's what these players dream about, or with they could dream about. Sleep is a joke. It will be pure adrenaline by the time they walk onto the field tomorrow afternoon.

Florida State has been reduced to backup quarterback Marcus Outzen after Chris Weinke was lost for the year. It's not such a bad deal, though. Outzen held his own in defeating Wake Forest last week.

The winner of the game makes an argument for the Fiesta Bowl, especially if it gets ugly, but God knows you can't have a loss and be a champion. C'mon people, that's elementary.

Florida, though, just too good. Gimme Florida on the road, getting 2 1/2.

On the undercard, I'm likin' Oregon State, getting 9 1/2 against Oregon. Also, in the week of the 'dogs, I'll take North Carolina, giving 6 1/2, on the road against Duke.

Honorable mention pick: Raffi Cruz, giving 15 with time running down. Bank on that one. He's money.

In the final week of the 1986 football season, the Connecticut Huskies travelled to Amherst to play the Massachusetts Minutemen with the Yankee Conference championship on the line.

That year, UConn fought to a 20–17 victory, forcing a three-way tie for the title between the two rivals and Delaware with identical 5–2 records.

Roughly four years later, on October 13, 1990, the Minutemen welcomed Connecticut into McGuirk with a 3–0 conference mark with the title on the line again. That time, UMass rolled to a 38–19 win, propelling them to an eventual 7–1 record, marking the last time that Massachusetts hoisted a conference championship trophy.

Fast forward to this year, on Oct. 17. Number 15 UConn hosted the Minutemen, who led the Atlantic 10 conference with two wins and no losses among A-10 competitors. Behind a school record of 413 passing yards by reserve quarterback Brian Hoffman, the Huskies came from behind with a 27-point second half to defeat their guests by a heart-breaking 44–41 score.

"I don't think you can make too much of a big deal out of losing," UMass Coach Mark Whipple said. "It was more that we didn't play great, especially in the fourth quarter when they outscored us 17 to nothing."

Now the tradition continues. This Saturday, No. 7 UMass and No. 9 UConn will battle it out for the conference title once again. The Minutemen currently hold the top spot in the New England division with a 6-1 A-10 mark, while Connecticut is close behind at 5-2.

"I just think it's come down to who's improved more in the last month, and hopefully we've made some great strides," Whipple said.

The hero of the last game, Hoffman, will return to the bench for this matchup in favor of senior Shane Stafford, who broke back into the starting lineup last week after a broken collarbone sidelined him since week five. Stafford bombed William & Mary for 360 yards and three touchdowns in his triumphant return, guiding UConn to a 34–26 victory in that game.

On the ground, the Huskies will place their faith in Barry Chandler, who has tallied 689 yards and eight touchdowns so far this year.

When UMass has the ball, they'll attack with superstars Todd Bankhead and Marcel Shipp at QB and running-back, respectively.

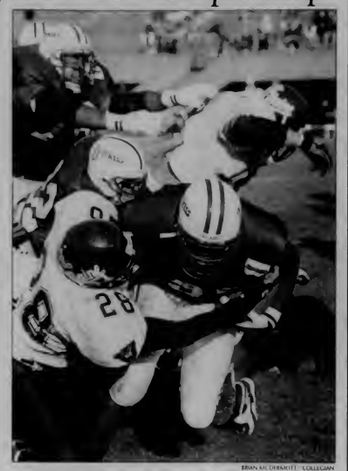
Bankhead, leading an offense that has led the conference in yardage all season long, was named the A-10 player of the week for his 353-yard, five touchdown performance against Maine a week ago.

Shipp has eclipsed the 100 yard mark in eight consecutive games, and has totalled 1,692 yards on the ground thus far.

Scoring 55 points on the Black Bears, many feel the always potent UMass offense has hit its peak, making the Minutemen very tough to beat.

"They're a great team, but this weekend everything will be clicking for us," Shipp said. "It will be a great game to watch."

Defensively, both teams have struggled, despite their lofty win totals.



Led by defensive back Jeff DeLucia with 111 tackles, the Huskies have been typically unable to slow strong offensive attacks, allowing 460.5 yards and 30 points an outing.

Those statistics could be key against a Minuteman squad that pours on 35.3 points a game, while moving the ball an average of 476.6 yards every time out.

On the other hand, UMass, whose defenders have come up strong as of late, allowing only 15 points two weeks ago against Rhode Island, have a reputation for being soft, letting up over 400 yards a contest themselves.

The pros and cons will work themselves out on Saturday, the biggest game of the season for both teams.

Minutewomen set to battle Hawaii, Kansas and UMinn

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team will be spending its weekend in Hawaii. The team will be competing in the Hawaiian Regent Classic, from today through Nov. 22. The tournament is to be held in Honolulu and is hosted by the University of Hawaii. The Minutewomen will see a slew of tough competition over the weekend, facing Kansas, Hawaii and Minnesota.

UMass will be looking to improve upon their 1–1 overall season record. The team was unable to pull out a win against Boston College on Monday. Its performance this weekend should prove to be an indicator of how well the team will be able to perform against top teams through the rest of the season.

The tournament will begin for UMass today at 2:30 p.m. (Hawaiian Standard Time), when they face off against No. 11 Kansas. The Jayhawks are the top-ranked team in the tournament, returning all five starters and all but one letterwinner from a team that went 25–9 last year.

Kansas, which has received seven straight bids to the NCAA tournament, advanced all the way to the Sweet 16 last year. The Jayhawks are 0–1 this year, after losing their season opener to No. 10 North Carolina.

The team is led by junior Lyn Pride, for the 1998 USA Women's Basketball Jones Cup Team, averaging nine points, a team-high seven rebounds, and 2.2 steals.

Another strong player for the Jayhawks is 5-foot-11 junior guard Suzi Raymani. Raymani scored 14.1 points per game and pulled down six rebounds. She is also the main three-point threat for Kansas, shooting 41.7 percent from behind the arc.

Ol' Saturday at 3:00 p.m. (HST) the Minutewomen will take on the University of Hawaii. The Rainbow Wahine will pose yet another tough challenge for the Minutewomen.

Despite losing top scorer Kylie Page to injury, Hawaii returns this season with a strong nucleus. Picked to finish first in the Pacific Division of the Western Athletic Conference, they feature All-WAC players B.J. Iroman and Raylene Howard.

Iroman is a senior point guard, who averaged 8.1 points per game last year, and 5.1 assists. Howard, a junior forward, averaged 16.4 points per game, 6.1 rebounds per game, and had an incredible 58 percent field goal percentage.

On Sunday UMass will take on Minnesota, their opponent of the tournament at 3:00 p.m. (HST). The Golden Gophers are 1-0 on the season, coming off of a win over Illinois State. Minnesota is looking to make a turnaround this season, after going 4–23 last year. The Gophers may have trouble with their offense, however, having lost more than 70 percent of their offense to graduation.

Head coach Cheryl Littlejohn will be looking for her two top players to show more improvement this year. Senior Senia Robinson, co-winner of last year's Minnesota MVP award, is the team's leading rebounder, averaging 3.8 rebounds per game. Their leading scorer is senior guard Mindy Hansen, who averaged 6.6 points per game last season.

The Hawaiian Regent Classic will also feature two experimental rules. The first calls for each team to have five mini-timeouts, of 30 seconds each. Four of those can be carried over to the next half. The second states that only five players can occupy the lane during free-throws.

UMass hockey to tackle Union

Mallen and Co. try to keep streak intact

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

One of the most difficult responsibilities as a coach is to get your team to play well after they knock off a highly ranked team, or after they upset a division leader in an emotionally charged game.

This is the problem Joe Mallen, the UMass hockey coach faced all week. Mallen needed to keep his team focused to play Union College this Saturday, after they stole three of four possible points in Hockey East from No. 4 Maine last weekend. The win improved UMass' record to 2–4–1, and 2–2–1 in the Hockey East.

"Our guys know that it is important to follow last weekends performance with a good performance this weekend. We gained some confidence last weekend, but we want to turn that into momentum, and play hard and make it a series of wins," Mallen said.

The Minutemen had looked mediocre at best heading into last weekend's games with Maine, but unlike last season the Minutemen didn't wait till the end of the season to upset teams. They have begun to make some noise in the Hockey East early, like coach Mallen talked about in the preseason. In fact, the Minutemen have as many Hockey East wins at this point in the season as they did on Jan. 31 of last season.

Union is considered to be one of those teams that a more disciplined, and all around better UMass club, can beat handily this season, but coach Mallen warns against his team overlooking such an opponent.

"I told the guys that earlier this season Niagra beat Michigan, and then overlooked Union, and then

UMass volleyball looks for pair of wins in A–10

By Paul Teves

The goals have re-adjusted slightly for the Massachusetts volleyball team this weekend. Although the Minutewomen have a long distance shot of making the Atlantic 10 tournament, they still have a shot and the best way to get to the top 15 by beating who's on top.

The 14–14 Minutewomen head to Norwood and Dayton, Ohio this weekend for a pair of what is likely to be season-ending matches against A-10 rivals Xavier and Dayton.

The Minutewomen enter A-10 play this weekend with a record of 11–7, but still only rank sixth in the conference, where they are tied with their most recent opponent and victim — Rhode Island.

"We had to re-adjust our goals, this team is tough and they want to finish over .500. It's something they have worked very hard to achieve," UMass coach Bonnie Kenny said.

The Minutewomen defeated URI at Curry Hicks Cage last Wednesday 3–1 to force a tie for sixth. Only the top four teams in the conference make it to Pittsburgh for the A-10 tournament, and UMass would need a miracle in the last weekend of the season for them to qualify.

"Rhode Island, George Washington and us, we've beat each other up and that's why only Virginia Tech, Temple, Xavier and Dayton will probably qualify for the A-10's," Kenny said.

Due to this turn of events the Minutewomen have had to refocus their goals. They are looking to possibly finish fifth in the conference instead of finishing seventh. They would also like to send a message to the A-10 leaders Xavier and Dayton.

"This team is made up of fighters, and they're not going to give up. They have a lot to play for in Ohio. They are very proud, and they would much rather finish fifth than finish seventh in the conference,"

Iraqi foreign minister denies documents exist

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — Iraq's foreign minister on Sunday accused U.N. arms inspectors of "a savage campaign... of disinformation" in their quest for more documents about the country's banned weapons.

The minister, Mohammed Saeed al-Sahhaf, said Iraq has already handed over millions of papers to monitors and claimed that no more files exist.

"Anything relevant to the work of disarmament, we had already handed over," he said, adding that Iraq has given 2,188,020 pages of documents to U.N. Special Commission and International Atomic Energy Agency monitors since weapons inspections began in 1991.

Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz said some documents in question are long lost and accused chief weapons inspector Richard Butler of trying to create a pretext to continue sanctions or allow the United States and Britain to attack.

Anniversary of JFK's death causes no fanfare

DALLAS (AP) — At one time, every American could describe, with keen emotional detail, the moment he or she heard President John F. Kennedy was dead, cut down by an assassin in Dallas.

That shocking moment was followed by days of nationwide mourning punctuated by orations under the Capitol dome, by the widow and daughter appearing at the flag-draped casket, by a solemn funeral cortege that was paced by hollow drumbeats and followed by a riderless horse, and by a little boy's salute.

A quarter of a century later, the anniversary was observed by the opening of the Sixth Floor Museum in the former School Book Depository, the building where the shots were fired. And on the 30th anniversary, the site of the assassination was commemorated as a national historical landmark.

Now, 35 years after shots rang out over Dealey Plaza, little fanfare was expected for yesterday's anniversary of the event that convulsed the nation.

In fact, other than the usual handful of curious people milling about Dealey Plaza, the day was expected to be uneventful, said Bob Porter, director of public programs at the Sixth Floor Museum.

No charges against Mack; no one to be "singled out"

By Lorraine Kennedy and Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

A Hampshire District Court judge declined to issue charges against University of Massachusetts basketball player Monty Mack on Friday, saying he did not want to "single out" just one person in the Nov. 1 dining hall melee.

The show-cause hearing was held to determine if there was sufficient evidence to file charges against Mack regarding an incident, in which several students were involved in a fight at the Hampshire Dining Hall in the Southwest Residential Area.

A female UMass student, Sinora Woods, made a statement to the UMass Police Department alleging that Mack punched her in the head twice, then pushed her to the ground.

Woods testified during the three-hour long hearing in Northampton that she scraped and bruised her arm and sustained a sprained wrist as a result of the fall. She said she originally declined medical attention from police, but later went to University Health Services.

Judge W. Michael Ryan, who presided over the hearing, said that he felt there was not enough evidence for a complaint.

"He [Mack] certainly pushed her," Ryan said. "[But] there were so many people involved in this ruckus... I'm not going to issue complaints in all of this.

"I think you [Mack] were overly aggressive for what happened outside. I don't think it was necessary to push that woman down," Ryan said, addressing Mack directly. "On the other hand, there doesn't seem to be any innocent parties here."

Several witnesses testified that the fight began when Mack's girlfriend approached another woman during brunch in the dining hall.

Testimony differed as to which of the two women threw the first punch.

The altercation escalated into a full-scale brawl involving two groups of women, witnesses said.

"There was a big knot of girls pulling each other's hair," Shruti Mulki, a UMass student who observed the incident, testified. "I thought, whoa, a chick fight."

Two dining hall employees testified that members of the basketball team became involved in order to break up the fight.

"I was happy that they [the basketball players] were there," employee Jerry Lacroix said.

Woods testified that Mack punched her once and pushed her when they were inside the dining hall.

"Monty punched me right here," Woods said, gesturing to the right side of her face. "He broke my earring. He pushed me up against a tray rack."

Several witnesses said they saw Woods fall into the tray rack, but no one could identify for certain who pushed her.

Woods testified that she told a friend, "'Let's go. Monty hit me. Let's go.'" The arguments then continued outside of the dining hall, she said.

Woods said that Mack confronted her outside and said, "This has nothing to do with you."

Woods testified that Mack punched her again after saying, "I know I fucking hit you and I'm going to hit you again."

Each of about a dozen witnesses corroborated that they saw Mack push Woods to the ground, however, testimony conflicted as to whether or not Mack punched her.

Phil Cavanaugh, the University's court liason officer, read excerpts of basketball player Kitwana Rhymer's statement to police. He said Rhymer told police that the only physical contact between Mack and Woods was Mack pushing Woods after she pushed him.

In addition, Rhymer said in the statement that both Woods and another female were "throwing very hard punches" at each other at the fight inside the dining hall.

UMass student Alice Brown, who was having brunch at the dining hall, said she heard someone yell, "Monty Mack is gonna hit someone."

Brown testified that she saw Mack "swinging his arms around in rage."

"It really looked like he was pumped and ready to strike," Brown said. "I saw Monty Mack take his shirt over his head.

"I just assumed it was another guy [that he was going to hit]. I was shocked that it was a girl, Sinora, and she was a foot shorter.

"I saw contact," Brown testified. "I saw her go down to the ground."

Molly Weiner, who identified herself as a friend of Mack's, testified that Woods was making threats both inside and outside the dining hall.

"I saw Sinora Woods walking towards us... pulling out her earrings, talking trash. Monty Mack tried to stop her," she said. "He pushed her. She fell."

A lawyer said in Mack's defense that there were "personal agendas" and "underlying motives" and that Woods' "credibility is nonexistent in this case."

"I don't think there is any evidence of criminal intent," he said of Mack's involvement.

Mack did not testify at the hearing, nor did he comment afterwards.

UMass men's basketball coach James "Bruiser" Flint said after the hearing that Mack was acting as an "intermediary" in trying to break up the fight.

Childcare center is given space

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

Childcare advocates at the University of Massachusetts won a victory Friday, as Chancellor David K. Scott agreed to commit space for a proposed flexible childcare center to open next semester.

The result of an extensive e-mail, letter-writing, and media campaign, Friday's decision came as a pleasant surprise to graduate student Jennifer Fasulo, member of the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO).

"I think it was really good news and definitely a big victory," she said.

The victory is the culmination of years of work by GEO and the Graduate Student Senate. They recently formed a joint Student Family Survival Campaign, using guerilla theater performances and public forums to educate the campus community and advocate the childcare issue.

Senior history major Jennifer Eastman-Lawrence was one of many student-parents who told stories of the obstacles they faced at last Thursday's public forum and panel discussion on childcare, housing, and welfare reform.

She was "overjoyed" that Chancellor Scott committed to the space for the childcare center.

"I'm glad he finally woke up and smelled reality," she said. "Maybe the numbers finally got to him and he realized the problem was not going away."

The flexible childcare center will be temporarily located in Skinner Hall, next to the School of Education's Preschool Lab school.

According to the GEO proposal, the Flexcare Center will be open 66 hours per week, from 7:30 a.m. to 9:30 p.m. Monday through Thursday, and 7:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. on Friday. This is an extension of the hours offered by the current University Childcare center, which is open Monday through Friday, 8:15 a.m. to 5:15 p.m.

The Flexcare Center will serve 16 children at a time in 3–4 hour units, allowing 40 children to use the center every day.

"It will provide relief," Fasulo said, "especially for students facing welfare cut-offs this December."

But she pointed out that the battle is not completely won.

"It's crucial to understand that the space is only allocated for the spring," Fasulo said. "We were hoping for a guarantee for permanent space. As of yet, we have no commitment after spring."

She noted that childcare providers need to be hired, and the space must be officially licensed by the Massachusetts Office of Child Care Services.

"Let's not jump up and down until we can actually drop off our kids," Fasulo said.

RSU/ Republican Club debate Iraq Sanctions; effect on children cited

Amidst a booming megaphone, picket signs, and a temporary replacement of the American flag, a tense demonstration of opposing views on the United States involvement in Iraq took place on the University of Massachusetts campus Friday at noon.

Standing on opposite sides of the Student Union steps, the two groups of students shouted responses to one another, remaining under control despite heightening tensions.

Toting signs such as "Stop the Genocide Now!"and "I Love My Country but Fear Its Imperialistic Government!" demonstrators against U.S. sanctions, many of whom were members of the Radical Student Union (RSU), shouted out opinions over a megaphone.

Clashing in opposition to them were mainly members of the Republican Club, as well as some members of the Reserve Officers Training Corps (ROTC) and war veterans. With American flags and signs such as "I Love the U.S. Army!" and "Let's Bomb Saddam Until He's Red, White, and Blue!" hovering over their yells and chants, supporters of sanctions also tried to make themselves heard, without the use of a megaphone.

Some RSU members called for an end to sanctions in Iraq due to the "over 600,000 children [who] have died since 1991 and 1.5 million people killed" as a result of sanctions.

Bron Tamulis, a member of the Radical Student Union and a junior social thought and political economy major, feels that there is a need for better communication between the U.S. and Iraq, without relying on an ultimatum.

Tamulis, who says he uses information from the International Action Center, U.S. State Government and World Health Organization, also believes that sanctions need to be lifted in order to allow the Iraqis a chance to recuperate, instead of forming resentments against the U.S. "Who are the real terrorists?" said Ari Weinstein, another member of the RSU, through a megaphone.

"I don't like Saddam Hussein, nor do I like dictatorial governments of any form. I'm in favor of any democratic government in Iraq," Weinstein shouted.

RSU gathers to protest; Iraq policy questioned

Administration, faculty, and town officials have accused the students of the University of Massachusetts of being apathetic. With low numbers of UMass students voting in state, local, Student Government Association, and national elections, some might say that students have provided the ammunition for these shots.

On Friday, however, students rallied together, and against one another, for a cause of international importance.

The Radical Student Union and the UMass Republican Club faced each other on the steps of the Student Union, in a debate over the United States involvement in Iraq.

Members of both groups, as well as others who showed up to demonstrate, challenged each other's views about events in the Middle East. Emotions on both sides were expressed through handmade signs, loud chants, and fervent discussion.

In front of the Student Union on Friday, apathy was absent.

"Saddam=Hitler," read one sign held by a Republican Club member.

"No Blood for Oil," said opponents to actions in Iraq.

Political attacks eventually become a part of the cronsfire between the two groups.

Ari Weinstein, a member of the RSU, accused the Republican Party of consistently finding ways to push down the working class and protect the rich.

Paul Ferro of the Republican Club responded, "What happened to protesting the Iraqi people? Are you here to talk about the Republican Party or Iraq?"

"It's unfortunate that Monty had to go through this and had to be singled out," Flint said. "But he's got to realize that there are going to be situations he has got to walk away from.

"I hope everyone involved here learned a lesson, like the judge said."

Flint also issued a statement through the UMass News Office.

"What is important is that Monty understands that as a student-athlete he lives under a microscope and everything he does will be magnified by the media and the public," Flint said.

In the judge's ruling, he told the courtroom filled with at least a dozen witnesses and supporters, members of the basketball team and the press that the behavior that took place at the dining hall was "insanity" and that the "fighting and violence is way out of hand."

"I'm flabbergasted these young women would hurt each other and assault each other," Ryan said. "I could issue six or seven complaints for assault and battery."

"I don't think Mr. Mack should be singled out," he said.

Ryan referred to a hearing earlier that morning, in which he sentenced a UMass student to six months in jail for seriously injuring someone in a fight.

"It could have been far, far worse," he said of the dining hall fight.

A supporter of the victim walked out during the judge's ruling, muttering, "This decision is absurd."

Woods also left during the decision and was later comforted by supporters as she cried outside of the courtroom.

Woods declined comment after the hearing.

Students call attention to hunger and homelessness

A trash-can fire and hot chocolate added to the warmth of candles and live music, during a candlelight vigil Friday night to raise awareness of hunger and homelessness.

Rain and dropping temperatures didn't discourage students and local residents from attending the all-night vigil that is part of National Hunger and Homelessness Awareness week.

"I'm very happy with the turnout," said vigil organizer Veronica MacDonald. "[The vigil is] to promote awareness [on hunger and homelessness] definitely, and about hurricane Mitch."

Due to the rain, the vigil was moved from the library lawn to the Student Union steps.

Over 30 individuals came and went throughout the night. Some sat in chairs with lighted candles as performers sang, others drank hot chocolate and roasted marshmallows around a blazing trash can.

According to Jennifer Hecker of the National Student Campaign Against Hunger and Homelessness, many people spend a lot more than one night without shelter.

"Families are the largest segment of the homeless population," Hecker said. "It can happen to anybody. The majority of [people in] the U.S. are one paycheck away."

Despite differences in politics, participants from various groups attended the vigil.

"[There is] a combination of people here I didn't really expect to see together," said Scott Heines, an Amherst resident, adding that some individuals at the vigil were on opposing sides during a protest earlier that day concerning U.S. actions toward Iraq.

"We always try to do community service," said Republican Club member Paul Ferro.

Also contributing to the vigil was Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group and Kent Higgins, United Christian Foundation Chaplain.

As part of the awareness week, many students skipped meals at dining halls and the money was given to help feed the hungry. Students gave up 2,457 meals, raising $1.71 each for the Oxford Committee for Famine Relief in a two- hour period.

Kevorkian dares prosecutors on TV's "60 Minutes"

By Jim Suhr
Associated Press

DETROIT — Dr. Jack Kevorkian injected a terminally ill man with a lethal dose of drugs on a videotape broadcast nationally Sunday night and challenged authorities to prosecute him for it.

"Either they go or I go," Kevorkian said on CBS' "60 Minutes." "If I'm acquitted, they go, because they know they'll never convict me. If I'm convicted, I will starve to death in prison, so I will go.

"The issue's got to be raised to the level where it is finally decided."

At least five CBS affiliates, all owned by Dallas-based A.H. Belo Corp., refused to air the Kevorkian segment.

Portions of the tape supplied by the retired pathologist to "60 Minutes" showed Thomas Youk, 52, who had Lou Gehrig's disease, being given a deadly dose of drugs.

Kevorkian said Youk died Sept. 17, less than three weeks after Michigan's enactment of a law making assisted suicide a felony punishable by up to five years in prison.

Kevorkian's face is not shown on the videotape, but he described his actions as Youkis shown being given three injections.

First, a drug is injected into Youk's right arm to put him to sleep. Youk's chin is to his chest and does not respond when he is asked if he is awake. Kevorkian said hethen injected a muscle relaxant to stop Youk's breathing, and his head begins to tilt back.

A shot of potassium chloride is then given to stop Youk's heart, Kevorkian said. Kevorkian, who has acknowledged helping about 120 people commit suicide, has been acquitted of assisted suicide charges in three trials, and a fourth ended with a mistrial.

In past cases, Kevorkian has said his clients voluntarily activated his homemade devices that delivered the carbon monoxide or intravenous chemicals that caused their death. With Youk's death, Kevorkian moved from assisted suicide to euthanasia.

Belo-owned CBS affiliates in Houston, San Antonio, St. Louis, New Orleans and Tulsa, Okla., broadcast local news during the Kevorkian story before airing the remainder of "60 Minutes." A sixth station owned by Belo, KREM in Spokane,Wash., where the news magazine was to air later in the evening, also planned to not air the segment.

"The corporation has a policy of not showing the taking of a life or themoment of death of an individual in its news broadcasts," said Marty Haag, a Belo senior vice president for news. "And a subset of that is the nature of the tape made by Dr. Kevorkian was not suitable for the '60 Minutes' time period."

Haag said Belo officials talked to CBS about running an edited version of the story on the stations after their late newscasts, deleting the 83-second sequence of the three injections and making other changes. CBS declined, Haag said.

CBS officials did not immediately return telephone calls Sunday night.

CRC seeks town support; Select Board to vote on issue at meeting tonight

By Rachel Uranga
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Cannabis Reform Coalition (CRC) will ask Amherst's Select Board and town manager to take a stand against the prohibition of marijuana tonight at the Select Board meeting.

"We are expecting them [the Select Board members] to vote it down," said Terry Franklin, CRC spokesperson.

The ballot question is an extension of a 1976 vote, stating the town's support for marijuana legalization, according to Franklin. If passed, it would be legally non-binding.

CRC expects about 25 people backing the measure to come to tonight's meeting at 6:15 in the Amherst Town Hall. Franklin believes that most of those won't necessarily be from the 150-member CRC, but rather, students who support the passing of the ballot question.

"This meeting is in response to the crack down [at Hobart Lane] and the spring rally," Franklin said. In late April, several UMass students were arrested for possession of marijuana during the spring rally at the Amherst Town Commons.

During the CRC sponsored rally, politicians and cannabis activists including Dean Cook, libertarian candidate for governor and David Lenson, a University of Massachusetts professor, spoke out against marijuana prohibition.

"People are angry about this. Hopefully it will get them involved in politics," Franklin said.

Sophomore Asha Siddik's room in Southwest Residential Area was raided by police three weeks ago, and several pieces of drug paraphernalia were seized. She has a direct interest in the meeting, since CRC is also asking the Amherst Police Department to deprioritize the enforcement of marijuana laws.

"There has been no proof marijuana harms anyone physically. It's natural and from the earth, whereas alcohol which is man-made has caused more damage," Siddik said.

Siddik supports CRC's effort.

"I would have gone but I didn't know about it," Siddik said, who already had conflicting plans. "They seized my water pipe and a clay pipe. It was a work of art."

If the measure is voted down, the CRC plans on taking the issue to the town for an April vote. Amherst requires a petition with at least ten percent of the town's 16,743 voters to support the measure in order for it to be placed on the ballot.

UMass students number 1,474 of those voters. The issue and its popularity among students is something the CRC is basing its strategy on. If it goes to a vote, Franklin said, "student's would put it over the top."

stopping Saddam Hussein, Weinstein said "We're not hurting Saddam, people are starving."

According to Ed Cutting, a graduate student and member of the Republican Club, the decision of the Republican Club to rally against the demonstration came when they learned that a protest was being organized by the RSU. The Republican Club decided to take action to "stand for America."

"We said 'it's time for the majority of students on campus to do this...over 90 percent [of students] support us," Cutting said.

Cutting reflected on Student Affairs Research Information and Systems (SARIS) surveys from the Gulf War, which he said showed that the majority of the student body was in favor of U.S. policy during the Gulf War.

Cutting was upset with what he feels is an unfair bias on campus in favor of student organizations which oppose U.S. policy. In a show of patriotism, Republican Club members and others reading from music sheets, began to sing the "The Star Spangled Banner."

"America is the founder of democracy. I believe they want to screw democracy," said Mike Marin, club membership director of the Republican Club.

In response to the opposition's appeal that sanctions are killing innocent people, Marion said "they have a good point...I strongly believe we need sanctions because Saddam is not listening to us. He's a threat to his own country and the entire world."

Outraged at U.S. sanctions, junior women's studies major, Bushra Mohammad, shared her thoughts on the deaths of children in Iraq over the megaphone.

"I'm saying that if they want one man [Saddam], they can easily get one man...it's because of the U.S. and our greed for oil...it's resources over human life," Mohammad said.

Those opposing the sanctions moved on to Memorial Hall at about 1:30 p.m., chanting "No blood for oil!" and "Lift their sanctions!"

At the hall, the group took down the raised American flag, folded it in a triangle and replaced it with a red flag which they said was to represent all individuals who have been hurt under sanctions, both American and Iraqi.

This replacement created the most unrest of any action at the demonstration, as many ROTC members felt it was disrespectful of past war veterans.

"I don't think they should be on the veteran's memorial. I'm a U.S. Marine and this is ridiculous. They [veterans] did their duty and died," said Lance Cpl. Garth Noack, a sophomore hotel management major.

Passersby stopping to listen to heated debates would occasionally yell out statements like "drop the bomb on Saddam!" before moving on.

Workers inside the Memorial Hall locked the doors and watched the event outside, saying they had only heard about the demonstration moments before protestors arrived there.

Although security vans circled around the building, the red flag was allowed to stay up until 3 p.m., as about 20 students formed a circle around the flagpole, singing and reserving a moment of peace for those who have and are suffering under sanctions.

Students slowly dispersed, and despite invitations to join in the circle, Republican Club members and others in opposition to the demonstration moved away as an attempt to sing "We Shall Overcome" was made by individuals in the circle.

Friday's demonstration by the Radical Student Union was met with opposition from students armed with American flags and harshly opposing opinions on the situation in Iraq.

opponents of not being patriotic.

"I can love my country while still being critical of it," shouted one protestor in response.

They began chanting. "I love America. I hate genocide."

"Go kill him [Saddam Hussein] yourself with your own hands, don't kill innocent children. It's called selfishness," yelled out UMass student Bushra Mohinned.

Members of the Republican Club continually brought up the point that if Hussein is not stopped now, he will only continue to kill people.

"He will keep invading and kill more people," shouted one supporter of U.S. involvement.

"He would have tried to take over the entire Middle East," said another.

Throughout the event, no uniformed police were present, and the crowd remained loud but non-violent.

Following the rally on the Student Union steps, the Radical Student Union went to Memorial Hall for what they called "direct action."

A sign hung up over the veteran's plaque which read, "For all who have died in war." The handmade sign read, "For all those who have died."

Replacing the American flag was a red flag at half mast as RSU members linked arms around the flagpole, but no security or police showed up to disrupt their effort. The American flag was folded neatly in one of students' arms.

People watching seemed to be complacently observing, or alarmed at what they perceived as an act disrespectful to veterans.

Members of the RSU explained repeatedly that their actions were out of a concern for "all the people who have died in the interest of profit."

Friday's event was not just a loud dialogue between students of clashing political ideologies.

More than once, a person walking by on their way to class stopped and listened to see what was going on. People on the sidelines came forward to speak into the megaphones, while those unsure of their own stance questioned and challenged the protestors in individual conversations.

The point of Friday's action was not to come to an immediate resolution about the Middleast. However, the direct confrontation forced people to formulate questions, and to think about the answers.

Debate over Iraq situation triggers student responses

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

Emotions ran high in front of the Student Union Friday, as members of the Radical Student Union (RSU) and the UMass Republican Club traded accusations and expletives at a rally about United States/United Nations sanctions against Iraq.

The intense debate was not limited to members of the two organizations staging the rally. University of Massachusetts students in the crowd had conflicting reactions to the event.

"This is stupid," said sophomore computer science major Rich Temple. "Nothing will change."

Scott Patterson, a freshman biology major, agreed. "Seems like the only people here have really strong opinions. This is not going to accomplish anything."

"I think this is a disorganized way of doing things," said Deborah Massachi, a senior social thought political economy (STPEC) major, "but it's creating attention [to] the issue and that's important."

Some of the crowd members were people who happened to be walking by, attracted by the intensity of the debate. Others had seen posters around campus and had planned to attend. Most had strong opinions about the issue.

"We've got to do something about Saddam," said freshman computer science major Alexander Levchuk. "I don't believe in sanctions. But, on the other hand, we need oil. There's nothing wrong with a country going to war for its resources."

"A lot of people don't realize that the sanctions the U.S. and UN is imposing on Iraq are a weapon of mass destruction, because they've killed 1.5 million people," Massachi said. "Our actions are not hurting Saddam Hussein, if that's the objective of the U.S. government."

Some students, like Bushra Mohammad, were moved to actively participate in the rally.

"When little girls were raped in Bosnia, where were you?" she said, addressing the Republican Club members over the megaphone. "Why are we, as a nation, selective in who we protect?"

"If you want Saddam, go kill him yourself with your own hands. Do not kill those children!" she later added, holding back tears.

Chris Lehmann, a senior Environmental Science major, stood silently behind a Republican Club member, waving an American flag.

"I'm definitely supporting the American [Republican Club] side," he said. "First of all, because I'm a damn American! Second of all, because I don't think sanctions have anything to do with starving children... If they would stop talking about sanctions and start talking about solutions, maybe we could solve something."

As most of the crowd followed RSU members to Memorial Hall, Lehmann and others stayed behind to air their disapproval of RSU's "direct action" flag removal.

"Don't go over there," one student shouted to the group as they left. "You don't belong there!"

"That's a total disgrace of every veteran who died for what you're doing now," another student added. "We were just over there [on Veterans Day] honoring them, and now you're disgracing them."

Brad Bemis, a senior Building Material and Wood Technology major and Vietnam veteran, silently watched as RSU members delivered speeches in front of Memorial Hall.

"Iraq has a problem; it's called Saddam Hussein. He sits in his palace drinking bottled water while his people starve," he said. "Get the facts before you open your mouth."

Bemis was visibly upset when he noticed the group had taken down the American flag and replaced it with their own red flag.

"I wish I could break his neck," he said.

Deeper into movies

"Heeeere's Johnny!" Jack Nicholson's crazed face leers through a shattered door as he chops it down. This is the fifth time I've watched The Shining in the past three days. My roommate has a Blockbuster card and, for some reason, the good people at Blockbuster Video think they are doing us a favor by letting us keep the film for five days.

Five days! Could someone please tell me who the hell needs five days to watch a two hour movie? I suppose Blockbuster thinks they're doing something nice for the consumer, but all the five day limit does for us is allow us to put off the bus ride to return the tape. And since the movie's just sitting there until we bring it back, we might as well get our money's worth by watching it again and again, right?

Wrong.

Personally, I think I got my money's worth of The Shining two viewings ago. It's a great movie, but when Stephen King and Stanley Kubrick team up, the result should be rationed out in small portions. So far, I've seen ten hours of Shining. That's 10 hours of axe-brandishing lunatics, weird little psychic kids, and rivers of blood gushing out of elevators. Too much more of this, and I'll be wandering around campus muttering "redrum" at my index finger. I don't think this is healthy.

> "When your major mode of human contact outside of classes comes from strange, intense, psycho– slasher movies, one's grip on reality starts to slip."
> Mark Shea

Of course, it isn't just The Shining that's doing this to me. I don't want to give you that impression. Before we rented this movie, we had Apocalypse Now, and before that it was Clockwork Orange. These are also fine films. Don't get me wrong, but I watched each of them more times than I can conveniently count. To make matters worse, when we turned off the movie tonight, Natural Born Killers was on TV. Where does it all end?

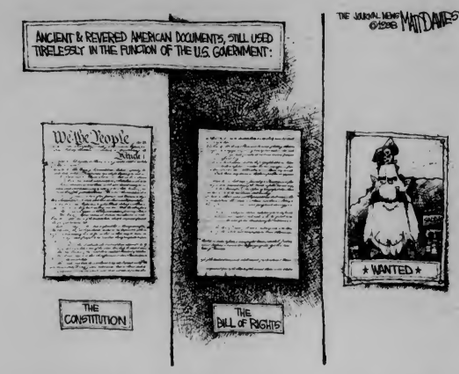
I started living off campus this year. It's so much better than the dorms. But when you come home, there are far fewer people hanging around to talk to. Now, I'm not saying I'm lonely, because for the most part I hate everybody. Not having to deal with people is a wonderful thing. However, when your major mode of human contact outside of classes comes from strange, intense, psycho–slasher movies, one's grip on reality starts to slip.

I don't think my roommate or I have gotten that bad yet, but he's thinking of renting Silence Of the Lambs next. Let this be a warning to you; if you see someone mumbling, "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy" over and over again, back away slowly, making no sudden movements.

People say that we have become desensitized towards violence in this hell–bound modern age. I suppose I can see the sense behind that statement. After years of being bombarded by violence in TV, movies, and news, it could start to have less of an effect on us. I mean, how many times can you see planes, cars, and trains crashing; rapes riots and shootings in urban centers; kids across America going to school and perforating their classmates with gunfire; movie stars blowing things up, breaking faces and so forth, before it all starts to blend together? After a while, wouldn't anyone become callous and indifferent to blood, fire, and death?



It used to seem like a pretty good theory, but after days of saturating myself with insanity, death, and general bad things, I have come up with another one. It seems to me that violence, whether seen or experienced, doesn't bounce off our jaded exteriors, we just get better at hurying our reactions to it. We don't seem affected, but those violent images stay behind and muck up our inner workings.

For instance, my roommate was snoring last night and I almost went to get a baseball bat to shut him up. Next time, I may have just watched Silence Of the Lambs a whole bunch more and try to eat his liver or something. What if we're all walking around, slowly being driven to the breaking point by the violence caught in our brains. We'd never know, because we all think we're desensitized. I mean, what's up with all this road rage business? I get a bit nervous thinking about it.

And by the way, Bob, if you're reading this, please disregard that part about my bludgeoning you to death in your sleep. There's absolutely no reason whatsoever for you to be more on guard than usual. Sleep as heavily as you'd like.

Heh heh heh.

Potential for the Honors College

The basic idea of the Honors College seems beneficial. Think about it, the Honors College will ultimately provide more opportunities for students; that is a good thing. There are many ways in which the bureaucracy of this university takes advantage of us, but I don't think we should be so quick to reject their Honors College. It can be very valuable, even if there are some serious flaws.

Lindsay McCarthy

Let's address a few of the advantages for a moment. The Honors Office offers support for people who want to write a thesis as a part of their undergraduate experience. Although this is a daunting task, some students want this chance to work closely with a committee of faculty that the students themselves put together, in order to do some serious research and academic writing. Most undergraduates don't know how to go about writing and researching a 30–100 page research paper, but the Honors Office provide staff and materials to those who might be interested.

Other opportunities are the honors classes themselves. The chance to enroll in smaller, accelerated courses as opposed to large and usually impersonal lectures is appealing to many students. Also, there is this place, the Office of National Scholarship Advisement (ONSA), where there are faculty availahle to help students find and apply for national scholarships and awards. There are many other benefits through the Honors Office, I'm sure, but these are the ways it has been has been of value to me.

> "We are the people paying for our educations and we can reject the "elitism" of the Honors College without rejecting its opportunities."

Okay, enough of the wonders of the current Honors Program, because there are some downsides that also need to be addressed. There is no reason why any of the facilities found in the Honors Office, and soon to be College, should be restricted to "UMass' best and brightest."

For example, if any student is motivated enough to write a thesis, s/he should have that opportunity regardless whether s/he has a 3.2 GPA or not. Some may argue that all students have the same opportunities, but simply need to prove their "quality" first, and of course continuously, throughout their UMass education. My feeling is that so long as every student is responsible for paying the same tuition, every student should have access to the same facilities, regardless of their GPA. If a student wants to graduate with the designated "honors," then they can adhere to the requirements set forth by the Honors Office/College. The other students who don't care about graduating with "honors," but still want those opportunities, should have them.

The Honors College has obviously been marketed to attract "better" students. There has been no concealing the fact that UMass has been putting a lot of energy ($$$$) into raising its reputation from "ZooMass" to "Land of the Intellectually Superior," but we (as the current students) do have some say in this transition. It's hard to imagine, considering the amount of red tape that chokes us on a daily basis, but the fact is that we are the customers here. We are the people paying for our educations and we can reject the "elitism" of the Honors College without rejecting its opportunities.

There is absolutely no reason why Honors students should be offered nicer housing, access to better computers, special advising, and the litany of other perks. The majority of these "opportunities" are obviously being created (or revamped) in order to attract incoming students. This is especially blatant considering that current Honors students themselves will have to reapply to the Honors College and also that certain applicants will be awarded huge scholarships depending solely on their class rank. The last time I checked, UMass was a public university. The main priority, I thought, was to provide an education for any anyone in the state of Massachusetts regardless of their "value" to the university.

The issue that keeps cropping up is that of monetary funds. The difference between the Honors Program now and the future Honors College, is that considerably more money will be available to spend on staff, faculty, supplies, and programs. That's not the bad part. UMass spends a lot of money in certain areas and it skimps on a lot of other areas. We won't get into that, but we will address the fact that UMass is going to sink some big bucks into a program that has the potential to greatly enhance many student's educations.

The Honors College may not have been created because they want us to do to better as individual students currently enrolled at UMass. They probably don't even care about us. I'm willing to bet that UMass is completely concerned with its reputation and ability to produce money through successful alumni, grants, and any other groups impressed with UMass's "progress." However, that doesn't change the fact that there will be many opportunities through the Honors College that we can take advantage of.

I'm proposing that we, the current students attending UMass, seriously consider what the Honors College can do for us individually. I think that the vast majority of students could find some reasons to support many aspects of the Honors College. I say make your opinion known, make appoinments, talk to people, write letters, protest even, but please realize that there are some, in fact many, benefits to be attained from the Honors College, so don't just dismiss its value. Pick and choose what you want to keep and what you think should be done away with and see what you can do about it.

The Honors College is a good Idea, but it's been created for political reason and caters to a small percentage of students here. There are lots of staff and faculty who work there because they truly want students to have incredible experiences. It would be foolish not to realize that, even if there are intrinsic flaws. Don't be so quick to cry elitism and walk away, demand the opportunities and demand them on your own terms. After all, if we don't, who will?

In the heart of the Campus Center

It's an inevitable fact (proven in many studies, especially extremely unscientific ones) that every single day, all 18,000 undergraduates on this campus walk through the appropriately named Campus Center. I know this because I see the same people everyday, especially a girl I've labeled "BankBoston chick," who always seems to be taking out more money. And I wonder, how is she so rich? If she's so rich, why is she going to UMass? And why is she using my password?

Bryan McAllister

The Campus Center, even sans ATM machines, is a busy place. It's the mecca of college life; the heaven where God (or the information desk girl) sits, observing and instructing her loyal subjects. These subjects, especially if you arrive between the hours of 11–1, are rambunctious folk. They traverse through the halls, weaving their way through the vendors and obstacles around them. A hotel and restaurant loom overhead. It's a lot like New York City, really.

Except we have no Rockettes. No, Chancellor Scott, your leg kicks are not high enough.

For that matter, it's similar to any city. The Campus Center is full of bad architecture and mysterious happenings. It's home to us, but it's also an enigma. What are all those rooms for, anyway? Does anyone actually buy those sweaters that hippie dude sells? And most of all, why is it that every time you escalate down to the basement to draw more cash from that ATM, there's a different, gargantuan convention going on?

Things at UMass are never publicized except if they involve basketball or money, which in the 1999 Webster's dictionary are actually listed as the same word. Plus there are so many little gatherings that it's impossible to convey the plethora of options available. I can accept that dilemma. But what are all these grand events that I'm missing in the C.C. basement? Now those seem really important.

Because suddenly, a once–barren hallway is laden with glorious red carpeting and majestic booths, apparently preparing for a visit from the Queen of England. Or is it just a group of fourth graders juggling copies of the collective works of Charlotte Bronte? Either seems like something I'd at least like to know about, partly because I hated Jane Eyre.

The implications are quite distressing. An important presentation could be unfolding, and you would miss it because no one told you about it. After all, as Woody Allen said, 99% of life is just showing up. It begins with the dexterity of 10 year olds, but it certainly doesn't end there. So, for the benefit of the entire UMass community, I'm going to relate the upcoming events in the Campus Center. Think of me as your messenger. The information girl is always doing her homework anyway.

Students celebrate Cape Verdean culture

By Rahilya Napoli
Collegian Correspondent

The Cape Verdean Student Alliance (CVSA) held their annual Cape Verdean Night this past Saturday at the Bluewall. Cape Verde is an African island nation, located west of Senegal.

This event, which is geared towards celebrating as well as sharing the Cape Verdean culture with people from the Five–College area and beyond, attracted a large crowd. Estimated attendance was tallied at around 340 people. The audience was composed of families, friends, and University of Massachusetts students.

"We always appreciate it when parents come and bring their children. We want to show them that their youth are doing something positive," said Cipriano Andrade, Director of Public Relations for CVSA.

The program included speeches, dance performances, awards and recognitions, a slide show, the unveiling of a mural, a dance presentation, poetry, Cape Verdean dinner, a keynote speaker, a live music performance, a party, and an after hours party.

Stephanie Barros, a 13 year old Cape Verdean youth from Roxbury, Mass., opened the night with an introduction to Cape Verde.

"Stephanie was great! It's hard to believe that she wrote that speech all on her own. She is going to be a great public speaker," Andrade said.

The keynote speaker Dr. Manuel Fontes, cardiologist and anesthesiologist at Yale University, addressed issues of biased treatment towards different ethnic groups in the medical field and how people should react to them.

"It all depends on how you react to situations where people are biased against you for whatever reason. Some people become helpless, others use it as a reason to succeed," said Dr. Fontes.

In a interview after his speech, Dr. Fontes addressed questions of how it is to be minority in the field of medicine.

"If you are Cape Verdean, African America, Native America, Latino, etc., you have to be exceptional in whatever you do if you want to succeed. You have to be your toughest critic, you have to be hardest on yourself."

Freedom Fighter Joao Jose "Iota Iota" Barbosa DaSilva was scheduled to speak, but had a family emergency at the last minute, therefore unable to attend.

"We really wanted him to be here. The red on our flag stands for the blood of our heroes who made it possible for us to be free of foreign domination. "Iota Iota" is one of those heroes who shed blood for us and was willing to speak at our night. A lot of people were looking forward to him speaking," Andrade said.

A mural of Amilcar Cabral was unveiled by UMass student and CVSA member Joao Amado. The mural, painted by UMass graduate student Shameek Weddle, portrays African revolutionary leader Amilcar Cabral on the left and other freedom fighters to his right with raised fists. The painting sent a powerful message to the audience.

"I can really feel the message and meaning behind it. The artist really captured him well," UMass student Jose Brandao said.

The mural will be permanently displayed in the New Africa House in the Central residential area.

A slide show presented by UMass student and CVSA member Isabel Martins, gave the audience a glimpse of the islands of Cape Verde. Pictures included shots from the islands of San Tiago, Fogo, Sal, and Maio.

CVSA's first annual "Sidonio Ferierra Award for the most Dedicated Member," went to UMass senior Verrissmo Galvao.

"The award is given to the member who has dedicated themselves and their efforts towards bettering our Alliance. 'V' has gone above and beyond his call of duty through his years as a member and President," Andrade said.

> "Our organization is always focused on educating and celebrating. At our events, you'll have a really good time, and always walk away with a little bit of new information," Andade said.

UMass graduate student and CVSA member Jose Cruz was given a certificate of recognition for his outstanding academic achievement. Cruz, who presently possesses a bachelor's in Computer Systems Engineering and a master's of Mathematics, is currently working on his Master's of Business Administration.

Mother of CVSA members Nuesa and Edna DaCosta, Domingas DaCosta was recognized for her contributions to CVSA as volunteer "Head Cook of Cape Verdean Night" for the past five years. Eugenia Gomes, mother of CVSA member Marlene Gomes, was recognized for her contributions to CVSA. Mrs. Gomes has been making the dance group's costume for the past three years.

Adilson Barros of Boston, Mass., and "Kola Cabo Verde" dance group from Brockton, Mass., performed dances for the audience.

UMass student and CVSA member Cecilia DeAndrade, with the assistance of dancers Nuesa Ribeiro and Luis DaCosta, presented a demonstration on the different genres of Cape Verdean music. As the DJ played the music, DeAndrade would give a historical account of the music genre and Ribeiro and DaCosta would perform the dance steps.

"This demonstration was effective because it gave the audience an opportunity to see all of the different types of Cape Verdean music and dance first hand," UMass student Hyden Valet said.

Live music by "Strela Negra" provided entertainment. "Strela Negra" is the first successful Cape Verdean/Hip–Hop group. Their music is influenced by traditional Cape Verdean and hip–hop beats, as well as lyrics. Since the release of their album in July, 10,000 copies have been sold.

"I really enjoyed it. It allowed the older generation to experience what the younger generation likes to listen to," UMass student Ruth Adusei said.

After "Strela Negra," the party continued with music by DJ Gui. From the Bluewall, the party moved to the Malcolm X Cultural Center for an after–hours party.

"Our organization is always focused on educating and celebrating. At our events, you'll have a really good time, and always walk away with a little bit of new information," Andade said.

"I was really proud of CVSA and UMass. Our Cape Verdeans here are really doing positive things. I want all of my children to have this same experience," said Maria DePina, mother of CVSA Vice–President Nancy DePina.

The Collegian's Black Affairs page is the once-a-week voice of the University's black community. The page represents not only the distinct voices of the University's men and women, but the culture, history, conflict and personality of the black community and its supporters.

A sheep amongst the wolves?

The question of the week is this: What would it be like if we had a black president in the White House?

Deep question huh?

(I'll refer to him as "he," but "he" could very well be a "she.")

After he makes it through his campaign without getting struck by the many bullets and knives aimed at him, and after surviving numerous bombings of his family's residential buildings, it could be the best thing that ever happened to the United States.

Edgar A. Barros

Black children all over the country would maybe, suddenly all possess this unstoppable drive to becoming the next "Mr. President." Parents who are struggling to get a job or raise their children on menial wages would suddenly see the ray of hope. Maybe, all of sudden, large corporations move to Black and Latino neighborhoods and offer jobs for the communities. Maybe all of a sudden the word ghetto is no longer associated with such negative images such as drugs and prostitutes, because the police fight the war on drugs, not the war on fake thugs. The CIA no longer pours the drugs down the throats of inner–city neighborhoods. Maybe, all of a sudden, there are more brothers out of jail than in jail.

(I am about to move you into the actual present day of this black President. Stay with me).

Today, everyone wants to move to the ghetto. The property value in the ghetto is soaring through the roof. Ghetto schools are equipped with state–of–the–art computer labs, up–to–date biology and chemistry labs, modern audio visual equipment, and field trips are a regular part of our children's daily academic curriculum.

Today, sports programs are provided for every elementary, middle school, and high school in the ghetto — every level. Today, children can play in the street and know that the police cruiser parked on the street corner is there making sure they are safe, and not there to harass them for accidentally acquiring a tan during their stay in Africa.

Today, Mom and Dad work at a company with all benefits included, annual pay increases, retirement plans, and safe working conditions. Mom and Dad actually have a say in what goes on within the company — how much is produced, which markets are targeted, which brands should be eliminated, etc. Mom and Dad come home happy every day because they like what they do at work. They not only have a job, but they also have a career.

> "Today, all of the children from the beaches of California to the avenues of New York call themselves Americans."

Today, the whole family takes vacations like those people on TV. We go to a tropical island in the Caribbean, we go to Disney World. They give me an allowance every week just because.

Today, we turn on CNN and "he" is on the screen addressing the nation. He mentions how low the interest rates are, how low inflation is, how low unemployment rates are, how the national deficit is decreasing, how the GNP is steadily increasing, how the middle–class is growing and the lower–class is shrinking, and how millions of immigrants are being allowed to make a better future for themselves and their families in the United States.

Today he is in England, today he is in Iran, today he is in China, today he is in Cuba, today he is in South Africa, today he is in Baker, today he is in Nigeria, today he is everywhere!

Today, all of the children, from the beaches of California to the avenues of New York, call themselves Americans.

Today, my cousin walks into Macy's Department store and the salesperson greets her with a smile and asks, "What can I help you with?" The security guard's eyes are not focused upon my dark hands today. I do not have my own highlight reel on "Macy's department store closed circuit TV system."

He comes to our schools in the ghetto and speaks today. He assures us that we are getting a fair shake as Americans. He tells us that things really are different now. He tells us that we are a sheep amongst the wolves no more — we are simply sheep.

But "today" is unfortunately not today. It probably won't be tomorrow. It probably won't be next week either. "Today" is coming though.

We (America) only have two options:

1) Full access and opportunity for everyone or

2) Armed revolution.

ARTS & LIVING

Mark Vinci & co. capture jazz's spirit

By Imogen Lillywhite
Collegian Correspondent

MARK VINCI
Bezanson Recital Hall
Nov. 19

There's something unrelentingly cool about jazz music that even the most cynical of audiences can't help but enjoy. This was proved 12 times over on Thursday night at Bezanson Recital Hall by Mark Vinci, alto saxophonist, with the University Big Band and other jazz oriented UMass students. Vinci spent part of last week working closely with music students by means of master-classes and completed his stay with a triumphant recital of examples of the work that had taken place during his stay here, time seemingly well spent.

The concert opened with three pieces from Vinci's album "Grand Slam," unpretentious as Vinci himself said, at "medium, slow, then fast" tempo arranged for a quartet. The "slow" piece was an arrangement of "Indian Summer," a tune from the 1920's with a sultry sound. These smooth sounds benefited from the dry, brushed-cymbal techniques of the rhythm section and looped together seamlessly, from solos to immaculate dialogue between the piano and saxophone. The quartet was then joined by two more students on saxophone and trumpet for a surprisingly optimistic "Blues Up and Down." The first half ended with compositions by students Joe Green and Brian Koning. Green's wistfully beautiful composition was not hampered in the slightest by his unusual choice of instrumentation of trumpet in C, flugel horn in D, euphonium and trombone.

The second half consisted of music from Vinci's album "As I Think About You" performed by the Big Band. "The Crow's Nest" summed up, according to Vinci, the spirit of jazz, as it was about climbing up high and taking a look around just to see what you can see. The wavelike interjections from the band were a perfect compliment to Vinci's spiralling solos. "Postcards" gave some hint, as Vinci explained, of the solitary lifestyle involved in being a musician on a solo tour, the composition made interesting use of the mellow sounds of the clarinets instead of the usual more blatant sounds of the saxophones. "A Little Dab" featured a fantastic bass solo which made heavy but inventive use of the glissando technique and was as skillfully conveyed as it was humorous. The concert came to a joyful end with a Band favorite "Thumbs," which made appropriate use of chattering dialogues between the five saxophones. Vinci finished up with an unaccompanied "When You Wish Upon a Star" which may sound in retrospect to be just too Disney-esque, but was an ideal improvisational vehicle for Vinci to display (yet again) his superb technical range from juicy low notes to divine screaming high notes.

The word "jazz" embodies, in the minds of many, independence and little consideration of one's fellow musicians. However, Vinci and friends proved that this need not be the case, and the more developed the relationship within the ensemble, the more fascinating and diverse the performance.

Allen exposes the Celebrity skin

It's not much of a stretch for Leonardo DiCaprio to play a famous movie-star in Woody Allen's biting Celebrity.

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

CELEBRITY
Directed by Woody Allen
with Kenneth Branagh, Judy Davis, Winona Ryder
Playing at Pleasant St. Theater

Polymorphously perverse models, hotel-trashing prima donnas and TV-show priests all inhabit the world of Celebrity, the latest satiric experiment from Woody Allen. The equally self-absorbed director uses a character in the film to sum his theme best by offering, "You can tell a lot about a society by who it chooses to celebrate."

Yes, all the freaks get their 15 minutes of fame in America.

Allen's 27th film plays like a travelogue of Woody's encounters with the rich and famous, examining the absurdity of a culture obsessed with the drug of glitz and glamour. But like most of his comic ingenuity, Celebrity walks a fine line between hilarity and annoyance.

Shot in stunningly crisp black and white photography, and featuring one of the most talented casts in recent memory, part of the fun of this film is just waiting for the next Hollywood icon to show up on screen. There's been a great Leonardo DiCaprio-bashing going on lately, but even he's brilliantly cast here (before the release of Titanic) and has a superb middle set-piece which reeks of star power.

Those who don't get their 15 minutes (and Allen points out that most don't) mold their whole lives around achieving it. Writer Lee Simon (Kenneth Branagh) hops from woman to woman, celebrity to celebrity, pitching his screenplay and hoping to get a big break. But all he breaks is his precious car, and the confidence of his ex-wife, played with Allen- like neuroticism by Judy Davis.

A far cry from playing Hamlet (or perhaps not), Branagh basically does a Woody Allen impression throughout the film. The director's biggest mistake is to allow this. Only Woody can play Woody, and while Branagh has all the nervous mannerisms down pat, he turns what should have been the film's strong center into a weak characterization.

Thus, Celebrity lacks a point of focus. The film is just a lot of ideas strewn together — we simply watch a collection of vignettes and wait for the ending. Luckily, some those vignettes are laugh-out-loud funny.

Beginning with a pampered actress's (Melanie Griffith) field trip to her old home, where she engages and then excuses a sexual act in an all too Clinton-esque way, and moving on to flirty young things played by Charlize Theron and Winona Ryder, the film is at its best when Allen allows his stars to have fun. Cameos from Isaac Mizrahi as a worried painter and Donald Trump up the ante of comic extravagance.

Some even better sequences involve Bebe Neuwirth's escapades with a banana and the backstage of a TV show, where gangsters, religious figures and neo-Nazis prepare for their arrival on-screen. "What is this," says a rabbi to a group of thugs, "did the skinheads eat all the bagels?"

It Celebrity as much a study of Woody Allen as it is of other famous weirdos? Of course. Does it have its flaws? Most definitely. It's like a mixture of Allen's last two, equally flawed films — Everyone Says I Love You and Deconstructing Harry. The former was too much a combination of ideas with no center, the latter too much a treatise on the ego of Allen.

But still, Celebrity is legions better than most films, and while the theme has been explored before, it's certainly still a timely one. The movie begins and ends with a skywriter above Manhattan, spelling out the word "Help!" Oh, do we ever need it — but the first step is to admit we need it. And Allen isn't fully ready to realize that perhaps he needs it most. B girlfriend in book editor Famke Janssen, who pushes him to finish his novel, but Branagh tosses her aside to meet Ryder's actress, a character who will be anything but faithful.

Of course, Simon's novel is about the downfall of a society obsessed with celebrity culture — just one of a long line of typically Allenish, self-reverential devices, the best being Simon's attendance of a film by a "pretentious director who always shoots in black and white."

"Sell played well. He did a great job shorthanded, and he's a quiet, effective leader on the ice, with great confidence. He kills penalties well and wins faceoffs," Mallen said.

Nathan Sell

The score remained 3-0 until there was 2:30 remaining in the second when Union finally caught a break. While on the power play, Union forward Drew Taylor unloaded a shot which Helanen stopped, but Jason Ralph was right on the doorstep to roof the rebound past Helanen.

The Minutemen showed their composure when they responded to the Dutchmen's goal a mere 35 seconds later; Jay Shaw fed a wide open Bryan Kennedy with a pass in the slot, and Kennedy fired it into the net just underneath the cross-bar for the Minutemen's fourth goal of the night.

Jeff Blanchard

"Nice finish on the goal by Kennedy, and it was important that it was 35 seconds later because it's a great bounce back goal, and it shows the other team that they're not going to gain any ground," Mallen said of Kennedy's goal.

Bryan Kennedy

The Dutchmen would add one more insignificant goal in the third period. UMass would respond by using some of the hard lessons they learned playing with a lead against UMass- Lowell to easily hang on to the lead against Union.

"This is very important confidence-wise because it shows we can play with a lead. It's a learning process. UMass- Lowell was a great learning experience for these guys and tonight they did a good job with the lead," Mallen said.

"It's good for us to get these wins like Maine. We just need to keep working on the basics and keep working hard," Blanchard said.

Despite the win and a good offensive showing, the Minutemen are still lacking on the power play, where again they went 0-5. One of the power play opportunities came when Union's Bryan Yackel received a five-minute major for hitting from behind; yet UMass was unable to score.

The Minutemen now have to take their recently found momentum and three-game unbeaten streak on the road to face Vermont on Tuesday night. They are up against a team they haven't beaten in their last two tries.

"Vermont is a big challenge for us. We have had a couple bitter, disappointing overtime losses against them, now it's our turn to go up there and see what we can do," Mallen said.

UMass volleyball splits, Minutemewomen up–end Dayton in last Atlantic 10 match

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

There were several questions that were unanswered heading into this weekend's pair of matches for the Massachusetts volleyball team. Unfortunately for UMass, whether or not they would be making a trip to Pittsburgh and the Atlantic 10 tournament was not one of those questions.

When the Minutewomen did reach Ohio this weekend to face Xavier and Dayton, they were tied for sixth in the conference, and still had a shot to improve on that ranking. They also had an opportunity to finish .500 or better, which would be an improvement on last year's mark.

The Minutewomen accomplished some of their goals for this weekend, against the top two teams in the A-10 conference. Although they were swept by Xavier on Friday night 15-12, 15-8, 15-12, they were able to bounce back — as they had done so many times during this season — when they swept A-10 leader Dayton, 15-7, 15-12, 15-7.

The Minutewomen finish the season at 15-15 and 12-8 in the conference, which is good enough for a tie for fifth with George Washington — one position short of a trip to the A-10 tournament.

The Minutewomen, despite being out-matched on paper, came to play against Xavier. They were competitive in two out of three games against Xavier, and would need several players to step up if they were to win.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Rebecca Hasson recorded 12 kills, 13 digs and six blocks en route to helping UMass split their pair of season-ending matches with Dayton and Xavier.

The Minutewomen received quality efforts from several players such as junior co-captain Kari Hogancamp, who tallied her seventeenth consecutive double-double against Xavier by posting 12 kills and 10 digs. UMass also received a double-double effort from freshman setter Heather Holtsberg, who recorded 35 assists and 11 digs. The Minutewomen also received a good defensive effort from freshman outside hitter Janeen DeMarte, who tallied 13 digs of her own.

Despite these solid efforts, the Minutewomen came up slightly short in each of the three games at Schmidt Fieldhouse. The one consistent problem for the Minutewomen against Xavier was their hitting; they tallied attack percentages of .119, .050 and .095 in game one, two and three respectively.

"In the 3-0 sweep against Xavier, we were in two of the three games. We really had a chance to win, but our offense was non-existant against Xavier," UMass coach Bonnie Kenny said. "They [Xavier] played a real tough pre-season schedule. Xavier is good, and if they play as well as they did against us Friday, they could win the conference tournament."

Jill Meyers

After suffering a tough loss to the No. 2 team in the conference, the Minutewomen needed to quickly regroup. They have done this well in the past, and Saturday night was no exception. They stepped out onto the court at the Frericks Center, and would dominate the No. 1 team in the conference at the net, offensively and defensively.

"We knew if we were going to make a game of Dayton, we would have to maintain the net, and we did that. Our execution was also exceptional," Kenny said.

As they have seemingly always done in the past, the Minutewomen jumped all over Dayton in game one. The Minutewomen hit for a .400 attack percentage in game one, and neatly beat Dayton 15-7.

Dayton would make it tougher on UMass in game two, but the Minutewomen's hitting and domination of the net allowed them pull out game two.

In game three the great hitting returned, and UMass leveled the Flyers before they had a chance to blink, and ran away with the game, 15-7.

Hogancamp had an outstanding hitting night for UMass, but failed to get her 18th consecutive double-double. She compensated for that by making only one attack error, which was early in the third game.

Holtsberg's setting was at a season best, when she found all her sets almost in stride. Junior co-captain Jill Meyers led in defensive digs, with 18, while also recording 14 kills, all on a day-old sprained ankle.

The onslaught of Dayton can also be attributed to Lauren Vander Veen's great hitting. She hit .444 while totaling 10 kills.

"Heather did really well. For the first time this season, she averaged 15 assists per game at least, Lauren was awesome [and] hit the ball well. Janeen did a great job shutting down one of their outside hitters. It might not show up in the box score, but she touched every ball and made a number of key blocks. Jill was also great despite being hurt the previous night she played great defense," Kenny said.

The Minutewomen have a lot to be optimistic about — after all, they aren't losing any players for next season.

■ victory

just under two minutes later.

"I've got to give Nathan Sell a lot of credit," Mallen said. "He's a quiet leader who has a lot of confidence. Usually he's out there doing the little things like taking faceoffs or covering the opposition's best player, so to see him get two goals tonight was great."

A shorthanded tally by Sell midway through the second period gave the Minutemen a three goal advantage, but Union struck later in the frame to trim the UMass lead to 3- 1. Bryan Kennedy rounded out the scoring for the hosts when he roofed a shot over Union netminder Brandon Snee for a 4- 1 lead. The visitors would add a goal early in the third, but it was too little, too late in a 4-2 UMass win.

"We've been playing good over the past couple of weekends, but we were only scoring one or two goals a game," Sell said. "We knew that we had to come out for this game and show some offense."

The 34 shots by the Minutemen were also a season-high, while the 17 shots that the defensive unit rendered were the second least allowed in a game this season. So, for a team that is looking to fire away at least 30 shots each night and allow no more than 30 in their own zone, Saturday's win turned out to be a victory in facets other than on the final scoreboard.

"A lot of people said that the Maine games were a fluke," Sell said. "But tonight we played well and scored some goals. Now we're just going to move on to Vermont."

UMass can get to the .500 mark for the first time this season on Tuesday night when they head to Burlington, VT to face the Catamounts of UVM. Although the Minutemen are well aware that hitting the break even point is the logical next step up the ladder, they are still disappointed that they aren't there already, mainly due to a 4-3 overtime loss to UMass-Lowell back on Oct. 28.

"I think that the UMass-Lowell game was a great learning experience for this team," Mallen said. "We know that if we had just won that game, we'd be 4-3-1 right now. But maybe it took that game to realize that you have to go out and play every team tough."

So now, with a seven game homestand in the books, one in which the Minutemen went 3-3-1, UMass will start a three-game road swing this week. After Tuesday's date with the Catamounts, the Minutemen will head west to Colorado next weekend for a pair of games against No. 3 Colorado College and the Air Force Academy.

"We've always played pretty well on the road, so we've just got to keep it up," Blanchard said. "We've just got to stick to the basics and keep working hard."

■ drops

he sprained his knee on a reverse play.

The Minutemen were penalized 12 times for 111 yards, but none was more damaging than a personal foul after Shipp's second scoring run. Jason Cherry then missed the 35-yard extra point wide-right with 14:35 remaining that, in the end, would have tied the game.

"They said it was warranted, so they called it fifteen," Whipple said. "We just happened to be going into the wind, and Jason hit it pretty good, but it kind of drifted to the right."

From the beginning, it didn't look like Whipple was interested in giving the ball away. After Shipp scored on a 39-yard run to open up the scoring, Andy Maclay recovered his own onside kick to put UMass back in business immediately. The drive stalled, though, on a Bankhead fumble.

Jimmy Moore shined despite the loss, snatching nine balls for 172 yards and two touchdowns. In doing so, he became UMass' single-season receptions and touchdowns leader, and the first Minuteman to surpass 1,000 yards receiving in a year.

"I'm having the most fun I've ever had in my life," senior co-captain Khari Samuel said.

■ McNeese

Taking snaps for both teams will be the accomplished quarterbacks. Cowboy Blake Prejean can boast 276 rushing yards to add to his 2,076 passing yards, but his touchdown to interception ratio is only 11 to eight.

Conversely, Minuteman Todd Bankhead has tallied 3,006 yards and 28 scores, both school records.

Receiving Bankhead's passes will be UMass record- holding senior Jimmy Moore, who, with 68 receptions and 14 touchdowns, leads a group of four Minutemen who have over 30 catches. Only one McNeese St. receiver, William Davis, has more than 30 on the year.

Homefield advantage might be key, though, as the Louisiana natives are expected to turn out in large numbers to support their talented players, even for a game with a relatively late 7:00 p.m. start time.

"Obviously, we played at night against a big crowd at Delaware of about 23,000, and I'm sure they're going to have a big crowd [at McNeese St.], so I think we'll be able to handle that," Whipple said.

If the Minutemen, at No. 11, can bring down the Cowboys in the Deep South, the UMass team might be looking at a rematch with Richmond in Virginia. The Spiders, who haven't played past the regular season since 1987, caught their stride to win the conference. Out of the 16 teams invited to compete, three represent the A-10, more than any other conference. A second-round matchup with Richmond would mean familiarity and confidence for UMass, having won there in week two.

Still, Whipple and the team refuse to look past McNeese St. after having lost a game which seemed after the first quarter to be a guaranteed win against UConn.

"[Saturday]'s game proved that anything that's supposed to go the way you think it is, probably is not going to," Whipple said. "We're just going to worry about playing McNeese. I'm not sure what's coming down the road."

Horoscopes

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Your usual strong- willed and aggressive approach may be too much today. Tone down just a bit, and let someone else get a word in.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You're in the mood for something festive, but can you spare the time or the money?

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Don't let anyone tell you that you're not doing something worthwhile today. The fact is that you're on a track that can lead to many benefits.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Can you handle doing many things at once? You'll be put to the test today, but if you keep your patience intact, all will be well.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You may discover quite suddenly today that something you had held to be true for a very long time is nothing more than a fantasy.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You may not get along with someone you're expected to work with in a highly creative manner today. Remember that personal feelings are not the priority.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Someone may be trying to "pull one over on you" today. Prove you are too clever for any such deception. Stick to what you know.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You'll find yourself in a fight to the finish today, but you are likely to be your own opponent. What is it that is making you so conflicted?

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — The way you've done certain things in the past may not be good enough today. In order to win the credit you deserve, you have to be on the "cutting edge."

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — There is never too little time for friends. Today you'll want to make it up to someone you've slighted unintentionally in days past.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You're in the mood for anything that is comfortable and soothing. Unfortunately, a family member is determined to keep things more lively.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Harmony is the key today, and you won't tolerate anything less. Shouldn't you be harmonious even in your pursuit of such harmony? Ponder that.

UM drops nail–biter to UConn for second time

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

In the world of "what if", the University of Massachusetts football team could model their entire season on this weekend's game against Connecticut. Instead, though, the team learned that that game cannot be played.

As turnovers stopped drives and penalties killed momentum, eventually the mistakes asked too much of the Minutemen, and the Huskies came away with a stunning 28– 27 victory in front of 16,392 rowdy fans at McGuirk Stadium.

"Seven" in the turnover column: you know it's bad when the quarterback committed six of them.

The Huskies' offense barely needed to step onto the field. Outgained by 314 total yards, they got the scores when they needed to, as quarterback Shane Stafford found Carl Bond from four yards out, which would be the eventual game-winning touchdown. They turned out to be the only points that the Huskies' offense would score.

UMass would get chances to regain the advantage, but Marcel Shipp's 257–yard effort was overridden by a fumble in the red zone which was recovered by the Huskies. With a minute left, the Minutemen had the ball at their own 45– yard–line, but Bankhead's pass over the middle was tipped by Jordan Younger, and brought down by DeLucia to finish the script.

UConn, like in last month's 44–41 victory over the Minutemen, made the big plays defensively when they needed to. Anthony Carter returned an interception for a score, and with UMass driving for a 21–point lead, linebacker Jeff DeLucia scooped up one of four Todd Bankhead fumbles and brought it back 63 yards for the score. That got UConn within seven before halftime, despite the fact that UMass had 10 more minutes of possession in the first half.

"It wasn't because of a lack of effort that we lost. It wasn't a lack of confidence," UMass Coach Mark Whipple said. "It's just one of those things that happens in football."

The Huskies immediately tied things up at 21, when Younger took the second half kickoff 92 yards for the touchdown.

"I still don't know how we won it. They outplayed us offensively. They outplayed us defensively," UConn coach Skip Holtz said. "But [we] went out and did what [we] had to do to win it."

UM to play McNeese St. in playoffs

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

After losing a heart–breaking 28–27 game against their archrival, Connecticut, the members of the Massachusetts football team were left to wait.

The ticking of the clock echoed in the ears of the Minutemen as they gathered anxiously in the William D. Mullins Center's conference room yesterday, to watch the NCAA Division I–AA selection show, live from Kansas City.

The team got noticeably restless as they saw UConn, who came to McGuirk ranked ninth in the nation, slide to the eighth spot and be named as a host to a first–round playoff game against Hampton.

Richmond, the Atlantic 10's automatic bid with a conference–best 9–2 record, was scheduled to welcome undefeated Lehigh, the fourteenth–ranked squad, in round one. The Spiders, who began a nine–game winning streak after UMass handed them their second loss with a score of 22–17, only captured the automatic bid because of the Massachusetts loss. At 8–2, with the tie–breaker, a Minuteman win would have guaranteed them a tournament berth and, most likely, a home game.

As it is, though, UMass was inked in to travel to McNeese St. for the first round of the tourney.

The Minutemen haven't seen post–season play since 1990.

"[McNeese St.] was a preseason No. 1, so we'll see how good we are," UMass Coach Mark Whipple said.

McNeese St., holding the second rank in the nation going into this past weekend, also suffered an upset, losing 31–30 to Nicholls St.

"Anything can happen. Who would've thought that McNeese, at No. 2, would've lost," Whipple said, recounting the wild weekend in Division I–AA football. "I think Appalachian St. was No. 3, and they lost, too. [Who'd have thought, with] the way we played yesterday that we would've lost?"

McNeese St. led the Southland Conference in scoring offense and in total defense with 33.5 points and 227.2 yards a game, respectively.

Running back Jessie Burton topped the conference in rushing yards, but only ran for 1,037 yards, compared to UMass' Marcel Shipp, who blistered through a predominantly A–10 schedule for 1,949 yards.

UMass beats Union 4–2, unbeaten streak at three

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The goal for the Massachusetts hockey team when they took the ice at the William D. Mullins Center Saturday night was to stay focused on the task at hand, which included beating Union College in order to keep their recent two– game unbeaten streak going.

The Minutemen did just that — defeating the Flying Dutchmen 4–2, and running their record to 3–4–1, and 2–2–1 in Hockey East.

UMass coach Joe Mallen spent time explaining to his team that beating No. 4 Maine was a great thing, which UMass did last weekend, but that the trick was to maintain this quality play and to create a streak of solid wins.

"It feels pretty good to have a home unbeaten streak, and it's exciting to have people come out and support us, it really gives me personally a lift as well as the guys," Mallen said.

The Minutemen heeded the call and responded by scoring four goals — the most they have scored in a game in this young season. The offensive firepower for UMass came from two juniors, Nathan Sell and Jeff Blanchard. Sell contributed two goals on the night, including a shorthanded effort, while Blanchard scored a goal and assisted on one of Sell's goals.

"It's a good change that we're scoring more than two goals a game. We have to show some offense," Sell said.

UMass also focused on not allowing as many shots on sophomore netminder Markus Helanen, and they were successful. The defense only allowed Helanen to see 19 shots last night, which is a substantial decline from the 40 plus per game he defended against Maine.

"It's a good feeling to have more defense in front of me, and the goal tonight was to keep the shots under twenty, and get more than 30 and they (the defensive and offensive units) did that job," Helanen said.

"Pre–game objectives [were to] outshoot them — eliminate shots in our own end — and we were able to stick to our game plan. [We were] very disciplined, and we reduced quality scoring chances," Mallen said.

The Minutemen opened up the scoring in the first period with 8:46 remaining, when Blanchard tipped home the puck past outstretched Union goalie, Brandon Snee. Blanchrad was set up on a pass from Ray Geever, who took a feed from behind the net from Jedd Crumb.

"On this first goal, there was a mix–up behind the net. [It was a] good job by Geever to heat the guy far side, and he just set me up," Blanchard said.

UMass would increase their lead 2:07 later, when Blanchard broke along the left side and beat two defenders before centering a pass to Sell who fired a one–timer past Snee. The period ended with UMass up 2–0.

The Minutemen showed no signs of giving up this lead in the second period. They came out and added to their lead with 9:35 remaining in the second. Joey Culgin fired a pass ahead to Jeff Turner, who broke out with Sell on a two–on–two. Turner sent a cross–ice pass which ended up right on Sell's stick, and Sell poked it past Snee in the top corner.

"You need to talk to Blanchard and Turner. Without those guys you wouldn't be talking to me. They did a great job tonight," Sell said. "On shorthanded goals it's all about getting the bounces."

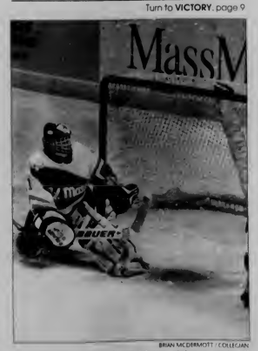
UM offense gets over the hump in 4–2 victory

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

A lack of offensive output had been the primary concern for the Massachusetts hockey team in its first seven games of the 1998–99 season.



Although the Minutemen had reason to be feeling good about themselves after taking three of four points from then– No. 4 ranked Maine last weekend, UMass still was haunted by the fact that they had failed to score more than three goals in a game this season.

Saturday night, however, at the William D. Mullins Center, the Minutemen finally broke free from that shell, jumping out to a 3–0 lead over Union College and eventually settling for a 4–2 victory over the Skating Dutchmen.

"In the pre–game we talked about trying to outshoot them [Union], eliminate shots in our own end," Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen said. "We were able to do that, so that was encouraging in that respect."

The Minutemen [3–4–1, 2–2–1 in Hockey East] jumped out to a 2–0 first period lead with a pair of goals in a span of 1:53. First it was junior alternate captain Jeff Blanchard who lit the lamp at the 11:14 mark, while fellow classmate Nathan Sell buried his first of two goals on the evening

Women's hoops loses three games; Van Huisen goes down once again

By Matthew J. Perrault and Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

HONOLULU, HI — The last three days out in Hawaii was anything but a vacation for the Massachusetts women's basketball team, looking nothing like the brochure, as they dropped three games to Minnesota, Hawaii, and Kansas.

Poor shooting was the story throughout the tournament, as they shot no better than 34 percent in any game en route to dropping their record to a dismal 1–4.

Yesterday afternoon UMass was looking to salvage one win from the three game tournament, but fell eight points short, losing 64–56 to Minnesota.

Senior center Yolanda Rayside had 15 points and 11 rebounds, while fellow classmate Tez Kraft had 12 points and freshman Caroline Nehls 11. However, it was not nearly enough, as UMass only shot 31 percent for the entire game, including two of 15 from behind three point line.

The post game came alive for the first time in the tournament for UMass, accounting for 44 of the 56 points. Yet, on the flip side, the guards weren't able to get anything going, as junior Alison MacFarland was one of eight from the floor and fellow guard Tonia Thomas was one of nine.

The defense of UMass let Minnesota have their way, as the Golden Gophers, shot 54 percent from the field and five of 12 from three point land.

Combined with the shooting woes of the Minutewomen, the game belonged to Minnesota. UMass had 21 offensive rebounds, but was unable to capitalize on most of them.

"We're getting open shots and some good looks, but we couldn't seem to make them fall," Kraft said. "It's definitely frustrating when you're getting good shots and there's nothing you can do."

Saturday night was a precursor of Sunday's poor shooting affair, as UMass was defeated by Hawaii 64–53. The game was a fast paced affair in which UMass again shot only 33 percent and missed numerous opportunities again on the offensive glass.

"We didn't execute our offense as well as we needed to," Coyner said. "They took us out of our offense and we were forcing up shots."

UMass was matched up against a quick Hawaii squad that set the pace and tempo of the game. The closest the Minutewomen got was two points, but was unable to come away with a win.

Coyner had 14 points in the defeat, while MacFarland chipped in 12. Nehls was solid in the paint with 11 points, and 13 rebounds. However, UMass still coughed up 19 turnovers and that, combined again with poor shooting, was once again the difference between victory and defeat.

Friday night's affair against Kansas was the first game of the 1998 season versus a ranked opponent. It came in the opening game of the Hawaiian Regent Classic and the Minutewomen were hoping for a strong showing. Unfortunately, disaster struck in the opening minutes of the contest against No. 17 Kansas.

Kelly Van Huisen

Sophomore guard Kelly Van Huisen and junior Jaywanna Bradley, both of whom sat out the 1996–97 season with left anterior cruciate ligament injuries, left the first half of the game against the Jayhawks with right knee injuries. Their status will be determined once the team returns to Amherst, but the loss of the two carried an instant impact over the weekend.

UMass trailed for the majority of the contest, and the shooting woes that plagued the Minutewomen in the game versus Boston College on Nov. 12, continued against Kansas.

UMass shot just 20–percent from the field in the first half, and went to the locker room trailing 26–18. The three point shooting that is so important to the flow of the Minutewomen just was not there. UMass was 0–for–4 from behind the are in first half.

Out of the half, UMass had done a good job containing pre–season Big 12 Player of the Year Lynn Pride, but Kansas was still too much for UMass.

In the end, junior Jaclyn Johnson was too much for the Minutewomen in the paint and finished with 13 points to go along with Pride's 15 in a 58–49 Kansas win.

For UMass, Thomas came off the bench to score a game– high 16. She connected on six of 13 shots from the field, and was two of five from three point land.

Unfortunately, the starting five for UMass combined for seven of 31 shooting and UMass shot a poor 36% from field in the game.

UMass lost this game because of missed shots and 18 turnovers. They had opportunities to win the game, but came up short on several occasions.

"I'm not taking anything away from them [the opponents], but a lot had to do with us," Rayside said. "We needed to settle down and do what we needed to do and take care of ourselves and we didn't do that. We need to put this behind us and focus on little things to prepare for upcoming games, most importantly our defense."

The worst that could have happened for UMass did happen on this hiatus away from the continental 48 states. The Minutewomen left the Aloha State with two available players less than they came with and were emotionally and physically drained when all was said and done.

Kathy Coyner

UMass came up on short end of every contest over the weekend. However, they will have only a few days to recuperate from the effects of this trip and the time change back in Amherst. They will face nationally ranked Georgia on Sunday at the William D. Mullins Center.

"We just ned to get back to basics and work towards the rest of the season," Kraft said. "We need to get back to being competitive and play the type of basketball we know how to play."

Saddam's deputy escapes grenades

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's deputy narrowly escaped an assassination attempt in a southern Iraqi city, Baghdad television reported yesterday.

Izzat Ibrahim, Saddam's deputy on the powerful Revolutionary Command Council, was attending a religious ceremony Sunday when assailants threw two grenades at him as he got out of his car, according to the report.

Several bodyguards and bystanders were wounded, the television reported. It said Ibrahim was not injured.

The attack in Kerbala, a Shiite Muslim holy city, came a day before Iraqi opposition groups met in London to find ways to unite their ranks. It was the first reported assassination attempt on a senior Iraqi official since December 1996, when gunmen shot Saddam's eldest son, Odai, about 10 times while he waited in his car in an upscale Baghdad neighborhood.

Odai, Saddam's heir apparent, survived the attack but now walks with the aid of a cane.

Kerbala is in the southern Shiite Muslim heartland, which has long been a source of opposition to Saddam.

Opposition groups have said that fighting has renewed in recent months in southern Iraq.

Slain ob–gyn doctor memorialized in N.Y.

AMHERST, N.Y. (AP) — Dr. Barnett Slepian's legacy will be a strengthened resolve by colleagues to help women in need of abortions, said the director of a clinic where Slepian performed abortions.

Marilynn Buckham of Buffalo GYN Womenservices was one of about 500 people who attended a community memorial service Sunday for the obstetrician–gynecologist who was killed by a sniper's bullet in his home Oct. 23.

"We will carry on. We will not stop. We will continue to help women. That's what he devoted his life to, and that's what he would have wanted," she said. "We will do this as a lasting testimony to his life."

Also present at the hourlong service at Temple Beth Am also were Amherst police officers stationed around the temple.

There have been no arrests in Slepian's killing.

Friends and colleagues laugned and cried at thoughts of Slepian driving a rusty 1960s Chevrolet and his dream, never to be fulfilled, of cruising down Route 66 at sunset in a recreational vehicle with his wife, Lynne.

"Reaching the destination was always something of an afterthought," said Louis Fink, a friend of 17 years who talked of Slepian's love of road trips. "It was no surprise when it took Bart 3 1/2 hours to drive to Toronto and six hours to drive to Syracuse."

Marijuana legalization declined by Amherst Select Board members

By Rachel Uranga
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Select Board unanimously declined to take a position on marijuana legalization drafted by the University of Massachusetts Amherst's Cannabis Reform Coalition (CRC) at last night's Select Board meeting.

Terry Franklin, CRC spokesperson, and Brian Julin, head of the local National Organization for Reform of Marijuana Laws chapter, presented the issue to the board with the support of 30 others.

The CRC's measure asks the town to take a pro– legalization stance in lobbying state and federal legislatures. It also requests the Amherst Police Department to deprioritize enforcing marijuana laws.

"While the laws are still on the books, they are asking us to ask police to wink at the laws. It's like putting the cart before the horse. We can't repeal state laws," said Hill Boss, Select Board member.

> "While the laws are still on the books, they are asking us to ask police to wink at the laws. It's like putting the cart before the horse. We can't repeal state laws."
> — Hill Boss

Had the enforcement issue not been tacked on to the statement of public opinion, Boss said, "It might have passed. Some of us might have felt differently."

Boss said he was not surprised the issue arose. "It's an issue that's time has come. There are four or five states out west that have already approved it."

Reflecting on the defeat, Franklin said, "We were expecting this to happen. This is something we had to go through. We knew we were going to lose this in advance."

The contentious point of deprioritizing drug enforcement is a central issue and part of CRC's strategy.

"We thought it would be a stronger statement if it was left in. We are trying to send a message. This is non–binding. We are not directing the police to take an action," said Franklin.

Franklin said the CRC will continue to advance the issue with the aid of it's neighboring allies, a coalition of 220 members that include, the Amherst College's Cannabis Education Organization and NORML's Pioneer Valley chapter.

Over the coming months, the coalition will be mounting a petition drive to place the ballot question on the spring ballot. The referendum requires 10 percent of Amherst voters, about 1500 people, support the measure.

Franklin and Boss both agree getting the referendum on the spring ballot will be difficult. Franklin said the CRC is committed to the task.

If the coalition does not muster up the support it is so desperately seeking, there are other alternatives to the same end. With the support of 10 people, the Town Meeting could pass the same measure. But Franklin says that would not be until late April, long past the town election.

Though no vote was taken on the measure, board members did not dismiss the issue altogether.

"I am not in favor of it [legalizing marijuana]. But I would have like to have been there," said Select Board member Homer Cowles, who had to leave mid–meeting to attend a Crocker school building committee meeting.

Two years ago, the town meeting passed a similar measure, stating its approval for the medical use of marijuana. Cowles, whose son had a mild form of multiple sclerosis said, "Until I listened to another fellow a couple years ago I never knew multiple sclerosis was painful."

He now believes the medicinal use of marijuana is justified.

Cowles position and the support of the board has had little effect on state policy. A point that Boss willingly acknowledges.

"Amherst's own meeting has a way of asking our state legislature to do the impossible, as they should."

Smokers find quitting is hard

Students participate in Great American Smokeout, local workshops

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

This past week, students at the University of Massachusetts advocated an end to smoking abuses on campuses nationwide. In honor of the Great American Smokeout, which took place last week, students participated in local Amherst substance–abuse workshops.

Free workshops on acupuncture, hypnosis and massage focused on making students more aware of the consequences of smoking and even offered smokers forms of therapy to put an end to the abuse.

For some students, like UMass sophomore Katherine Stepasiuk, the most effective method to quitting went beyond what workshops could offer.

In recognition of the Great American Smokeout, Stepasiuk agreed to quit smoking for a whole day. When she discovered the difficulty of not smoking for a day, Stepasiuk realized the extent of her habit.

"It wasn't that bad during classes, but anytime I walked on campus, it was difficult seeing other students smoking cigarettes," Stepasiuk said. "It makes me feel good that I can go a day without smoking."

With more than 70 percent of the UMass population consisting of "smoking" individuals, Stepasiuk felt the best way to reach out to students about the long–term negative effects of a smoker was to detach herself from being one.

"I've gone up to only a day without smoking and if there's any advice I'd have for people who haven't started, it is don't even think about it," Stepasiuk said. "There's no point to smoking; it's totally disgusting."

When Stepasiuk started smoking at age 15 she didn't imagine the potential of becoming a full–fledged smoker. She recalls her mother's addiction and indicated how easy it was to find a cigarette. In less than a month, she was smoking a pack in two weeks.

In walking around, she would suffer from loss of breath, and she realized the toll her smoking was having on her breathing.

"In going a day without smoking, I didn't physically feel any different," Stepasiuk said. "Mentally, I knew I couldn't have one."

Whitewater's Susan McDougal found not guilty in embezzlement

By Linda Deutsch
Associated Press

SANTA MONICA, Calif. — Whitewater figure Susan McDougal was acquitted yesterday of embezzling from conductor Zubin Mehta and his wife — a case she said was trumped up to pressure her to testify against President Clinton.

The jury acquitted her on all counts, including forgery and failure to pay state income taxes. McDougal would have faced four years in prison if she had been convicted.

McDougal, 44, was accused of stealing from Mehta and his wife, Nancy, when she worked as bookkeeper and personal assistant to Mrs. Mehta from 1989 to 1992. She was initially charged with taking $150,000, but the sum was reduced to $50,000 during trial. The case took five years to get to trial. By that time, McDougal had become famous, hailed by many as a hero for her steadfast refusal to testify against her friend Clinton before the Whitewater federal grand jury. It was a decision that cost her 18 months in jail for contempt.

In addition to her contempt jailing, McDougal served 3 1/2 months of a two-year sentence in a Whitewater-related loan fraud case. She was released because of a painful back condition. Also convicted were her late ex-husband James McDougal and former Arkansas Gov. Jim Guy Tucker. She still faces prosecution in Arkansas for her refusal to testify in the Whitewater case. The California case played out as a Hollywood-style subplot of the scandal in Washington, but jurors were cautioned not to consider possible ulterior motives for the prosecution.

Defense lawyer Mark Geragos said Kenneth Starr had promised to make the embezzlement charges go away if McDougal would testify. When she refused, he alleged, Starr "propped up" the case and urged prosecutors to move on the defendant.

Jurors had said they knew of McDougal's stand-off with Starr but agreed to ignore it.

In the Santa Monica courtroom, her adversary was not Starr but Mehta, a former actress.

Mehta insisted that she never gave her assistant permission to sign checks or credit card receipts.

Asked if she knew McDougal was signing receipts on a joint credit card in both their names, she replied firmly, "No, never," and said she didn't even know the card existed.

Documents produced by the defense appeared to contradict that with her own signature showing up on the same card for some $30,000 worth of goods.

McDougal painted a different picture of their relationship. She described her employer as a sister-like friend who showered her with gifts. She said they became inseparable, lunching together in fine restaurants and shopping "like tornadoes" at the best stores in Beverly Hills.

Vandalism and theft high; UM area cautioned by Public Safety

The University of Massachusetts Department of Public Safety released a public safety alert to the University community in response to the high amount of theft and vandalism on campus recently.

According to the alert, UMass residents were "victims to over $8000 in damage and theft" this weekend alone.

"Most of the victims," the alert stated, "are students who park their cars in the exterior parking lots. In several of the cases, the perpetrators of these acts are clearly committing them at random.

"In other cases," it continued, "it is clear the thieves are using sophisticated tools to commit the crimes."

The release urged members of the University community to help deter vandalism and theft from the parking lots.

"We ask that anyone seeing individuals or vehicles acting suspiciously in the lots to call 911 immediately," the release said. "If possible, use the help telephones located in the lots. Give the dispatcher a description of the suspects and any vehicles they may be traveling in."

Reno unlikely to order Gore finance investigation

By Michael J. Sniffen
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Janet Reno is likely to again decline to order an independent counsel investigation of Vice President Al Gore, this time over whether he lied to investigators about campaign fund raising, officials said yesterday.

Reno must send a decision on Gore by today to a special court, which selects counsels. She faces separate, similar decisions about President Clinton and his former deputy chief of staff Harold Ickes in the next two weeks.

The question of whether Clinton and his aides illegally funded issue advertisements during the 1996 election also is unlikely to be sent by Reno to an independent counsel, according to Justice Department and law enforcement officials, who requested anonymity. That decision is due Dec. 7.

The Ickes case has the greatest chance of prompting Reno to order what would be the seventh independent counsel of her tenure to look into a top Clinton administration figure, these officials said. Reno has until Nov. 30 to decide whether there is enough evidence the former White House aide lied to a Senate committee about administration assistance to the Teamsters union during a strike against Diamond Walnut Co.

Clinton, Gore and Ickes have denied wrongdoing.

Republicans in Congress have pressed Reno for two years to turn over the campaign finance investigation to an outside prosecutor. Reno's task force of more than 120 prosecutors and investigators has charged 14 people, including prominent Democratic donors and fund-raisers.

Her aides anticipate Reno will take each decision "up to the last minute," as one official involved in the deliberations said Monday. Just in case, they drafted papers to go either way, although the documents requesting an independent counsel are terse and contain far less information than those that explain why she does not name one.

Reno got the recommendation of her criminal division on the Gore case Saturday, and she is known for peppering aides with questions and demands for more information during the final reviews of these decisions. While considered unlikely, an unanswered, last-minute question from Reno might force her to request 60 more days to study any of the cases.

As before during the two-year-old campaign finance investigation, she has conflicting advice. FBI Director Louis J. Freeh said last week he and bureau officials made recommendations on the three cases, but he wouldn't divulge them.

Law enforcement officials said Freeh recommended a counsel, as he has Attention deficit disorder may be identified by new brain scan test

By Paul Recer
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Researchers say a new test using a special brain scan can identify children who have attention deficit disorder, the behavior syndrome that causes millions of kids to be placed on powerful drugs.

Just as importantly, the finding of a biological "signature" in the brains of those with ADD could help determine a child does not have the disorder, according to the Stanford University researchers.

Their announcement, to be published today in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, comes just days after a government panel concluded that doctors have no consistent, physical way to identify ADD or diagnose who has it.

The brain scan technique needs further testing, however, and could prove expensive. Insurance companies generally do not pay for the special type of brain scan, called a "functional MRI," that is required. A regular MRI can cost more than $1,500, and a functional MRI, available at just a few hospitals, can cost even more. Nevertheless, "we've taken a first step that looks very promising," said Dr. John Gabrieli of Stanford's Department of Psychology, the study's co-author.

Attention deficit disorder, or ADD, also known as attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, usually is diagnosed in school-age children. The diagnosis is usually based on observed behavior, and some experts believe it is highly subjective, essentially just an educated judgment.

Symptoms of ADD include the restless inability to sit still to read, study or even watch television. Often a child cannot play in group games, and a common symptom is the inability to control impulses. Some mild forms of symptoms are common in many children, leading to concerns it is diagnosed too often.

"Many people are concerned because the diagnosis remains very subjective," Gabrieli said. "It is possible to misdiagnose a child and miss another condition, or to over-diagnose a child who is merely rambunctious."

A biological signature of ADD, in contrast, would allow for "a valid and consistent diagnosis," he said.

Mind-affecting drugs such as Ritalin are the most common treatment, but some doctors and parents worry about their long-term effects, which have never been studied.

The Stanford study used a special type of magnetic resonance imaging device, the functional MRI, to individually scan the brains of 16 boys between the ages of 8 and 13 while they were playing a simple mental game. The MRI detects which part of the brain responds to specific actions or to drugs.

Ten of the boys had been diagnosed with ADD, and six were considered normal. These six were used as a comparison control. In the game, the boys watched letters of the alphabet flash individually on a screen. The boys were to push a button for every letter except X. When X flashed, they were to resist the impulse to press the button.

"They were seeing a lot of letters except for X," said Gabrieli. "They got so used to going that it was hard to stop." Since impulse control and poor concentration are a hallmark of ADD, those patients with the disorder did much more poorly than the normal patients, he said.

When the researchers compared brain scans, there was a clear difference in brain activity between the ADD patients and the other boys.

The boys were next tested after they had been given doses of Ritalin. Curiously, the drug improved the performance of both groups to the same extent.

But when the brain scans were compared again, the researchers found that boys with ADD had more activity in the basal ganglia, a brain structure, than they had before taking Ritalin. In contrast, the boys without ADD had less activity in that part of the brain. The test thus gives "a brain signature" that specifically and biologically identifies those with ADD, Gabrieli said.

However, it is still preliminary and must be proven by testing both boys and girls and by being duplicated independently in other labs, said Dr. Chandan J. Vaidya, the main researcher.

Neighbor helps abused woman to safety

AUSABLE FORKS, N.Y. (AP) — A 64-year-old woman survived a violent, two hour sexual assault to escape her attacker and seek help from a neighbor.

The bleeding woman crawled to the apartment of neighbor Daniella Smith, 24, who hid the woman in her kitchen as the alleged attacker looked for her.

"She crawled up onto my porch, naked and bleeding all over, and started hanging on my window," Smith told the Press Republican of Plattsburgh. "Blood was pouring out of a gash on her neck, and she kept screaming 'He's trying to kill me.'"

The woman, whose name was withheld by police, was sexually assaulted and beaten Saturday night in her apartment by an assailant who plunged a knife into her neck, state police Lt. David Dennin said yesterday.

Smith wrapped the woman in a blanket, wrapped her neck wound with towels and led her to the kitchen at the back of the apartment.

"I turned off all the lights, and she crouched down on the kitchen floor," she said.

Fearful for the safety of her sleeping 2-year-old and 4-month-old daughters, Smith told the injured woman to stay still until the ambulance arrived.

Without a telephone in her home, Smith ran outside in the Adirondack Mountain village to get help and was approached by John L. Rouse, the man charged with the attack.

"He asked me where his grandmother was, and I said she went running naked past the church," Smith said, pointing from her living room to a church down the road.

Though police said Rouse and his victim are not related, the man apparently had been renting a room from the woman since July and referred to her as his grandmother when speaking with local residents.

As Rouse took off in the woman's car, Smith went to a neighbor's home to use the telephone and find a safe place for her children. But the neighbors there refused to open the door and Smith then tried unsuccessfully to get help from a passing motorist.

Rouse returned to Smith's front porch two more times and demanded to know his "grandmother's" whereabouts.

Smith ran across the street to the home of a state trooper, whose wife was at home. Jana Deyoe called police and went outside to see Rouse pulling away in the victim's car, Dennin said. A few minutes later, Rouse showed up at the local convenience store and asked the people inside if they had "seen an old lady." Rouse, 26, was pulled over by police in the car and taken into custody by midnight. He was charged with rape, robbery and possession of a weapon and held without bail. He has an arrest record in California and Massachusetts and was on parole for a New York conviction, Dennin said.

The victim was hospitalized in stable condition.

Study shows water shortage very real

By Randolph E. Schmid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Water shortages in parts of the world in the next 25 years will pose the single greatest threat to food production and human health, according to a study financed by the United States and Japan.

At a time when 1.3 billion people worldwide have no access to clean water, it also could become a key issue in conflicts, warns the report's author, World Bank vice president and agriculture expert Ismail Serageldin.

"New ways must be developed to take advantage of this diminishing resource if humanity is to feed itself in the 21st century," said Serageldin, who heads the Consultative Group of International Agricultural Research. Work on the atlas was financed by the Japanese government and the U.S. Agency for International Development.

In an effort to improve water management, the group has compiled a massive electronic world water and climate atlas, a high-tech undertaking designed to assist local farmers, their bankers, government planners and even international financial groups.

Few Third World farmers have the knowledge or equipment to download the atlas from the Internet or read it from compact discs, Serageldin acknowledged. But the data will be available to government agriculture agents who work with farmers.

Indeed, the project has already identified a region in Bangladesh where farmers can plant a type of chickpea on land that previously was left idle during the dry season — thus adding a second crop to their annual food production, he said.

The atlas provides maps of every country on earth, with the user able to call up a variety of information. For example, farmers can examine rainfall and hours of sunshine, temperature averages and soil types in their home area.

Worldwide, about 80 percent of water use goes for agriculture, and demand is increasing. Most new food output comes from land that requires irrigation — meaning that water scarcity, not shortage of land, is likely to be the biggest impediment to food production in developing countries.

The atlas, Serageldin said, can help identify "areas which today do not produce food but could without destroying forest." It can tell planners where new or different crops might be grown without irrigation, or with supplemental irrigation rather than costly full-time irrigation.

In all, a quarter of the world's population is expected to face severe water scarcity in the next 25 years, even during years of average rainfall, the group estimates.

And as surface water increasingly is used up fully in semiarid regions of Asia, the Middle East and Africa, groundwater tables are falling.

The group also hopes to add more local information to the atlas. That effort is now complete for the Indian Ocean country of Sri Lanka, and other parts of Asia are being added.

"Down on the small scale is where the investment decisions come in," Serageldin said.

In the past, the data in the atlas has not easily been available to local farmers and planners, but was usually scattered among several government or international agencies.

Currently, she smokes around a pack a day and says that around 80 percent of her friends are "heavy" smokers. Stepasiuk blames the tobacco company and her mother's smoking habits for the reason that she started.

"I'm upset at the tobacco companies. Why invent something like cigarettes? It's so stupid," Stepasiuk said. "I think smoking is filthy and disgusting, but I started because my friends did, and now it's even harder to stop."

Because she abstained from smoking for a whole day, Stepasiuk feels the experience has given her more of an initiative in quitting smoking. She commented on her willingness to attend a smoking workshop as long as her friends agreed to go with her.

"I definitely see myself quitting smoking for good at some point in the future," Stepasiuk said. "I want to quit so I can see if I can do it for myself and more importantly for my health."

twice before. Freeh has argued the sprawling probe should be investigated as one potential scheme to circumvent campaign laws and, at least to avoid an appearance of a conflict of interest, an outside counsel should be in charge.

But other officials said she was getting contradictory advice from career department prosecutors, whose advice she has taken over Freeh's before. A year ago, she turned down independent counsels to probe Gore's telephone fund raising and Clinton's use of White House coffees and overnight visits for contributors.

Clinton, Gore and others were interviewed during the current 90-day inquiries conducted by Justice officials.

The Gore case revolves around whether he lied to investigators during last year's probe when he said he understood a Democratic Party media campaign fund that paid for the issue ads contained only so-called "soft money," like that Gore thought he was raising in telephone calls from his office. Reno ruled last year that federal law barred only soliciting "hard money," which advocates election of specific candidates, from government offices.

Since then, Gore's private lawyer has turned over handwritten notes, by Gore's former deputy chief of staff David Strauss, from a Nov. 21, 1995, strategy meeting Gore attended at the White House. The cryptic notes contain a reference to the media fund being composed of a combination of about two-thirds soft money and one-third hard money, which is allowed by the Federal Flection Commission.

Investigators interviewed those at the meeting to see if the division of money was discussed in detail while Gore was there and if he showed he understood it.

The Clinton case involves whether issue ads, which both parties use, crossed the line into advocating Clinton's election. A Federal Election Commission staff audit argued this summer that they did and recommended requiring Clinton's re-election campaign to repay $3.4 million in federal matching funds.

The law requires that violations be knowing and intentional. Democratic Party general counsel Joseph Sandler has said he reviewed the ads and altered some to conform to what officials believed the law required. Senior Justice aides have said that could well provide Reno with clear and convincing evidence there was no intentional violation by Clinton.

America Online, Netscape merger would establish challenger to Microsoft

By Ted Bridis
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The planned marriage of America Online and Netscape would create a single Internet company with remarkable reach across the high-tech world — and influence to challenge giant Microsoft's dominance in key areas.

America Online Inc., the world's largest Internet provider with more than 14 million subscribers, confirmed yesterday it is negotiating an all-stock deal to buy Netscape Communications Corp., whose "Netcenter" Web site is among the four most popular on the Internet with more than 20 million visitors each month.

The AOL, Microsoft and Yahoo! sites are the other three most popular.

In addition, AOL would acquire Netscape's pioneering Navigator browser software, which was introduced in 1994 and helped popularize the Internet. The software is now used by millions of people to view information on the Web.

In a side deal under consideration, Sun Microsystems Inc. would take control of Netscape's business-level "server" software and, in return, AOL would buy Sun's powerful workstation computers.

"Sun is dying to get into the software business, so owning Netscape's software business would increase their ability to get into that market," said Stan Dolberg, a consultant at Forrester Research Inc.

Netscape, which separately confirmed the negotiations, said its shareholders would receive .45 shares of AOL stock for each of the 99.5 million outstanding shares of Netscape stock.

AOL traded most of yesterday in the high-$80s, making the deal worth between $3.8 billion and $4 billion, although the price briefly peaked at $91.63, its highest ever.

The companies have been negotiating for at least two weeks, and talks continued yesterday. Both AOL and Netscape cautioned in statements that "there can be no assurance that an agreement will be reached or a transaction consummated."

The alliance would pose dramatic new competition for industry giant Microsoft, whose own business tactics against Netscape are so aggressive that the federal government is suing it for alleged antitrust violations.

Microsoft's Internet software competes directly against Netscape's, and its Microsoft Network online service is a rival to AOL, although MSN has been far less successful.

Sun competes against Microsoft in several areas, from rival operating systems to its Java technology that runs programs on many types of computers, not just those using Windows.

All three companies share a general disdain toward Microsoft — all are testifying, for example, on behalf of the government at Microsoft's antitrust trial in Washington.

"The major driver of this has been the personal connections between the principals in this deal, who have a common mission to be successful but also a common secondary goal to win at Microsoft's expense," said Frank Gens, chief analyst for International Data Corp.

AOL agreed in March 1996 to incorporate Microsoft's Internet Explorer browser, not Netscape's, into the software for its 14 million subscribers. In exchange, Microsoft included AOL's software within its dominant Windows operating system.

Analysts were divided on whether AOL might jeopardize its placement within Windows by distributing Netscape's software to its customers. That move could restore Netscape's share of the browser market to its highest levels since Microsoft began its full-court competition.

"It seems to me pretty clear, if this deal happens, that AOL customers will be seeing a very strong marketing of the Netscape browser to them," said Gens. "If Netscape and AOL get together, AOL and Microsoft's friendship will be cold and somewhat short-lived."

As Microsoft's antitrust trial entered its sixth week, the company was quick to claim that the AOL-Netscape proposal proves the government's case is moot, given the fact that Microsoft may soon have a new super-rival.

A people's history of...

I heard a while back that there was no turkey at the first Thanksgiving, and that it probably wasn't even in November. They served fish or something like that. Fish? Can you picture Thanksgiving waiting by the front door for Red Lobster to deliver some fish sticks? Not cool. Next thing you'll be telling me is that the Lions didn't play and Woody Woodpecker wasn't in the Macy's parade.

But slowly my ignorance slipped away, and as I grew up I heard more truths that were kept from me. Here's what I've learned recently about the fathers of Thanksgiving, our favorite dress-wearing zealots, those wacky Puritans.

Roger Williams and the wandering eye

Quick history: Roger Williams was banished from the Massachusetts colonies back in the day for some religious "issues." Or that's what they'll tell you in history class.

Mike Messaros

The real reason was that Roger Williams did not look straight ahead while at the urinal. All men realize that this is de rigueur — no peeking, eyes forward. But that Roger Williams — he had the "wandering eye."

They tried to cure it by applying bitter root and salamander breath, applied gingerly with a bit of parsley and a side of cranberry sauce. That did nothing but attract the dogs of neighboring colonies.

"Roger Williams, avert thine eyes!" was heard more than once in those days. Now it would be explained away as a case of Attention Deficit Disorder, but back then it was much more insidious. It happened more than once, and people started noticing. "The devil has gotten into Roger Williams," they would whisper.

Finally it came to a head. Roger Williams was sharing a tree with the minister of the colony. Feeling eyes on him, the minister glanced over and saw Williams glancing sideways.

"Roger Williams!"

"Yes, minister?"

"What hast thou to say for thineself?"

"Whatever do you mean, sir?"

This was the last straw and the minister decided to finally bring an end to the madness: "Get thee gone from this colony!"

Williams was livid: "This is because of my misshapen head, isn't it?" Thou hast It in for me!" Williams did, in fact, have an oddly shaped head, as evidenced from the wood carvings of the day. But historians agree it had nothing to do with his being kicked out.

Williams left to form Rhode Island, proud home of the Providence Bruins. Rhode Island School of Design and a lot of bowling alleys. His parting words to the colony were "Like a drifter, I was born to walk alone."

Micah, the Ill-Tempered Pilgrim

Micah never understood why his family couldn't just have chicken pot pies and pudding cups for Thanksgiving. And he hated his family, visiting them every year with his wife and kids. Always with the questions: "How goeth life, Micah?" "Doesn't the Lord shineth down on us well?" "How healeth thine rash?"

Finally, after a bit of corn liquor on one particular Thanksgiving, Micah told them what was up: "Shut thine trap, or I will make thine cow's milk turn sour!"

"Don't you dareth, Micah!"

So Micah got up, walked out of the house, into the barn and scared the tar out of the cows. And, indeed, the milk would be sour. "The devil has gotten into Micah," his family whispered, watching.

"Micah, you are banished from this house," his brother shouted at him, face red with anger, pointing at the door.

"Fine," said Micah, "I don't need you. I don't need anyone!" He pulled his family outside drunkenly, stopping only quickly in front of his 17-year-old niece. "You," he said, waving a drunken finger in her general vicinity, "you are growing up to be one foxy lady."

And for every year after that, Micah's family celebrated Thanksgiving over pork fried rice at the local Chinese restaurant. So there was the first drunken Thanksgiving spat.

Henry, the Jive-Talkin' Puritan

After Thanksgiving became a staple of American society, in the tradition of yellow fever and public stonings, colonists eagerly awaited the holiday. Even more than witch burning. Neighbors discussed over crude fences their plans for the holidays and how blessed they were. Then there was Henry, who spoke an unheralded new language — jive.

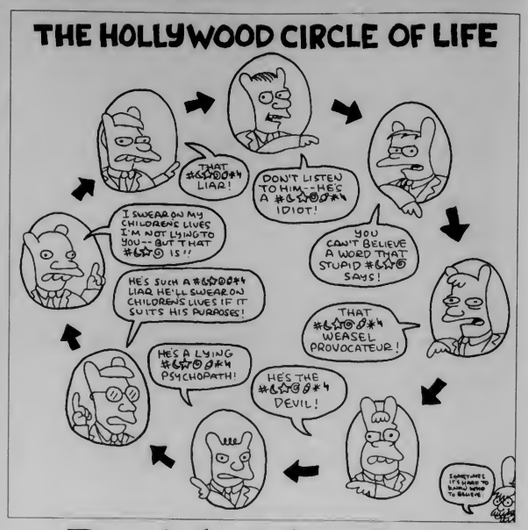
"Henry, hast thou a turkey," his neighbor asked one day.

"Who you calling a turkey?"

The neighbor was taken aback: "But my dear brother, I only question the bountifulness of your harvest. Now is the time to celebrate the good lords gifts."

"Man, you're like school on the Sabbath: no class."

"I am what? Henry... I do not know how you have come about such judgements, or what exactly of which thine speak."



Word started getting around; Henry was speaking in tongues. His references to "fatties" and "gats" were starting to worry people, and they had no idea how to "take a chill pill" nor how exactly they were supposed to come about finding one.

The local apothecary/barber was pretty pissed, though, when he found out Henry was handing out prescriptions. "I apprenticed for a good 20 years before I could hand out 'chill pills' and the like," he remarked. "And I'm sure Henry wouldn't know a leech from eye of newt!"

"The devil has gotten into Henry," the town whispered. The last straw was when he called Goody Goodwife "sweet thang." "Have you done your prayers at the altar today, Henry," she asked. "I'd like to pray at your altar, sweet thang," he answered. And thusly, he was kicked out.

Henry, by the way, went on to settle Northern Jersey.

Don't legislate love

Two friends invite you to a wedding you have waited five years for them to have. You have described them as soul- mates more than once, and after these five years, even their families agree.

The problem, though, is that the law refuses to grant two women a marriage license.

As reported in the Collegian, a gay couple up Vermont is attempting to overturn the law that prohibits homosexual marriages. In effect, the couple's suit is an attempt to legally further the equality of all sexual orientations.

Marriage, of course, began and still is founded in religion. In this country, Christian marriage is by far the most popular. However, because of technological and moral changes recently, the marital institution has changed drastically. It has gone from not allowing divorce for any reason, to an early 20th century position of divorce with probable cause, to the no-fault divorce of today.

Along with this, technological innovations have allowed divorce to occur. Marriage once was very necessary for a family's survival, as two people were needed to complete the chores and farming. Industrialization combined with increased consumerism allowed men to give up their farming and enter into manufacturing jobs. At this point, one person was still needed to do daily chores, and society chose the woman as this person.

By the 1950s, however, technologies such as affordable appliances and mass-produced clothing meant that even the woman's practical purpose in the home was reduced to only mothering. Women, though, were given this role by default and society's belief that women are better parents than men.

Marriage itself, though, has evolved from a survival and economic institution to an emotional one, where partners' feelings about one another are most important. The family only needs the capital to survive, since stores sell nearly everything. This change in marriage's purpose allowed for the successes of the feminist movement in the '60s, since women no longer needed to maintain the home for it to survive. Moreover, there is little indication society has reached its final position on the marital institution.

Throughout these changes, though, many economic benefits and society's tax system formed around marriage. For certain tax breaks, a couple must be married. Also, health benefits typically change if one is single or married. This means that a marriage license not only allows for formal recognition of love, but an opportunity to take advantage of things exclusive to married couples.

But, because most government members are of Christian denominations, in effect most marital laws and benefits are grounded in Christianity. I am certainly not attacking this religion, but to uphold our freedom of religion, we cannot allow religious laws to dominate our country.

Allowing one religion's laws to control marriage forces everyone desiring the legal and personal benefits to adhere to its system. However, not everyone follows Christianity, for it can either be followed in a small scale or not at all. In effect, then, by prohibiting homosexual marriages, we are penalizing people for not following Christian marital ideals. Therefore, besides violating the anti-discrimination laws that our University follows, prohibiting non-Christian marriages violates the First Amendment — freedom of religion.

Besides this, rejecting homosexual marriage licenses denies the benefits that company health care plans give to families if that company does not recognize live-in relationships as family. In a country that refuses to pass a universal health care plan, such laws prevent a partner who does not have the option of affordable health care from having any at all.

Arguments against homosexual marriages include that they are not natural or that marriage's purpose is to ensure procreation. Homosexuality has always existed; we have just not recognized it until recently. Also, with thousands of infertile children, homosexual couples would provide a secure base for these children. Moreover, to the absurd idea that many possess about homosexual parents providing a poor family model, one only needs to look at the already present dysfunctional families. This nonexistent risk to children could not be any greater than these families put children in.

Current marital laws not only force people into following Christian ideals, but also legislate love itself. Because the true foundation of marriage is the affirmation of love between certain people, telling homosexuals that they cannot marry in effect tells them that their love is not valid in America. In the case of the two women of whom everyone around them calls soul-mates, this idea seems ridiculous.

True, a marriage license should not be a sole indicator of love between people. In terms of the relationship, a license is unnecessary. But, as it is a sign of marital legitimacy and a ticket to several monetary and health benefits, it becomes necessary.

No government should legislate a loving bond between two people. Even if a majority does not respect homosexual marriages, denying a group of people marriage makes a country with religious freedom hypocritical. Homosexual marriages injure no one, and their legalization would be a further step toward universal equality.

UMass dorm–a–stories

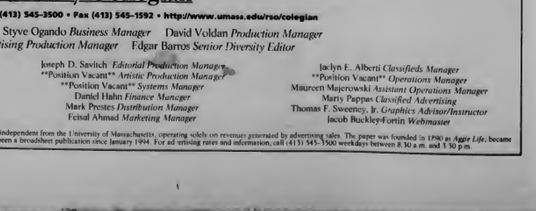
When I first came to UMass as a freshman, I was overwhelmed with the campus, having come from a small private high school. The biggest adjustment for me was getting used to living in the dorms with hundreds of other students my age. I had to get used to sharing a room and, consequently, having no privacy, even in the bathroom. But over time I started to enjoy my living quarters. And now, two years later, while many of my friends have already moved off campus, I'm still happily living in the dorms.

My off–campus friends don't understand it. They argue that having their own apartment symbolizes freedom from dormitory rules. Gone are the public bathrooms, noise violations and bans on alcohol and cigarette smoking. Limited space is no longer an issue, and it is possible to have your own room. Not only that, but in an apartment the bedroom does not also serve as kitchen and living room like it does in a dorm room.

Yet I'm still postponing moving off campus. Living in the dormitories the past three years has enabled me to meet numerous people. Every year, my circle of friends has widened and I've had unbelievably fun times within these cinderblock walls. Where else than the dorms would it be possible to have Round Robins, floor parties and late–night movie marathons? Only in the dorms could you find someone still awake to hang out with when you stumble home at 4 a.m. on a Saturday morning. Even the fire drills are kind of fun; everyone gathers outside, chatting and smoking cigarettes, until it is time to go back inside your building.

The most fun I've ever had while living in the dorms occurred one night last semester. My friends and I discovered the door leading to the roof of our low–rise dormitory unlocked, so we went up there, drank some brews, and talked until the sun came up. You can learn a lot about people after they have been drinking all night and have been up for almost 24 hours. Not only that, but you can't live with and see your friends on a daily basis and not start to feel like they are family. My friends from UMass are the best friends I have ever had in my life. And I attribute my good fortune in having made such interpersonal relationships to having lived in the dorms.

"I've had unbelievably fun times within these cinderblock walls. Where else than the dorms can you have Round Robins, floor parties and late–night movie marathons?"



Christine Coco

Of course, there are times when I'm not always so appreciative. Being woken up in the middle of the night by drunken yelling outside or getting scalded in the shower when someone flushes the toilet are examples of two such times. But I figure I have the rest of my life to live peacefully in an apartment or house. We're only at UMass for four years (assuming you're a decent student and don't take six years to get your diploma), and a large part of the college experience involves living in the dormitories.

Twenty years from now, we are going to nostalgically reminisce about these four carefree and responsibility–free years. Learning is our sole responsibility right now, not only academically but socially, too, and dormitory living can be a major contributing factor in building friendships and memories, something I like to call dorm–a–stories.

Islamic Awareness Week

Lecture focuses on myths, stereotypes and damaging images regarding Muslims

By Rebecca Sablo
Collegian Correspondent

On Tuesday, Nov. 10, the third night of Islamic Awareness Week, Ingrid Mattson, a Canadian Muslim of Irish ancestry, spoke at Mount Holyoke College on Islamic religion and culture.

Mattson focused on the popular myths and stereotypes that surround Muslims. Many of these misconceptions, she said, are formed because "there is a very complicated relationship between religion and culture" in Islam.

Mattson believes that American culture is one of the chief instigators in misrepresenting Islam. Many Americans form their ideas about Islam based on what they see in cartoons as children and later in sitcoms and movies, she said. "The more popular image is that of the religious fanatic terrorist," Mattson said, which is portrayed in the United States.

Even less dramatic but still damaging images are produced. In the Disney movie Aladdin, "evil Jaffar was hook-nosed with a beard" and drawn to resemble an Arab. "Aladdin had a nose which resembled my Irish ancestors," said Mattson.

"The thing that really frightens me," said Mattson, "are Hollywood films."

She explained that the association people get from movies like The Siege are blown-up buildings and Muslim Arabs.

"The impact of it is so damaging... Should I put a plaque on my back that says I am not a terrorist and walk in front of a movie theater for a week?" questioned Mattson, as a way to counteract the generalizations.

"I don't believe that Hollywood is a big conspirator against Islam, but rather they are all in it for money. Every movie needs a villain," said Mattson.

Even in the news, media takes problems and "simplifies them to the point of Islam against the West," said Mattson.

Mattson believes, "In certain areas of media there is more room for participation and improvement."

She explained that the more information and interaction people have with Muslims, the less they'll associate them with popular stereotypes. She has learned this from her own experiences. "I have had few experiences where the assumptions have continued for some time," said Mattson.

Nevertheless, Mattson explained, she and other Muslims are faced with the stereotypes everyday. When people see my veil, she said, "the initial reaction is 'Hello, do you speak English?' When I begin to speak, it becomes less visible to people." People automatically associate veiled women as having certain political views and hating certain groups, said Mattson.

An apartment manager once told Mattson, a very pale-skinned woman, that it was a shame their confrontational neighbors could not see past the color of her skin. "When she [the manager] saw the scarves," Mattson realized, "she saw a foreigner. Her beliefs were formed by all these stereotypes."

Mattson also told a story of her students who shared the same Metro Pass. The guard let them through every time because he couldn't see past the scarves, said Mattson, even though all the girls were different sizes and shapes.

"Before we can even begin to think of Islam...we need to search ourselves for what we associate with Islam," urged Mattson.

Mattson said the biggest problem facing Islam today is that "development as a community has been distorted by so many political events." The colonial experience destroyed many Muslim ties and people began to be apologetic or reactionary when Muslim ideas and customs were discussed.

Mattson promoted discourse and dialect between communities and said "there should be a process of identifying problems from the outside, reacting to them, and changing them." She hopes Muslims will eventually be able to determine and discuss what is best for them as a whole.

Reaction to Mattson's lecture was positive. Anisa Kagzi, a high school sophomore from Longmeadow, said "it was a very general topic and she covered everything I wanted to know."

Rabia Bajwa, a sophomore mathematics major from Mount Holyoke College, said "I thought it was great and it got people to break stereotypes of Muslim women."

Ingrid Mattson is a Professor of Islamic Studies and Christian–Muslim Relations at the Hartford Seminary. She received her bachelor's degree in philosophy from the University of Waterloo in Ontario, Canada and will soon finish her doctoral dissertation in Islamic Studies at the University of Chicago. Her specialty is Islamic Law in Society.

Pakistani scholar speaks about the global spread of Islamic spirituality

By Kiera Meehan
Collegian Correspondent

The spread of Islam around the globe was the subject of Pakistani scholar, Zaheer Ali's speech when he came to the University of Massachusetts campus last week.

Ali explained the waves Islam has experienced through history around the world in a lecture entitled "The Spread of Islam Around the Globe: How did it happen?" sponsored by the Muslim Student Association as part of the celebration of Muslim Awareness Week.

Ali, who has master's degrees in business, electrical engineering and physics, conducted a self study in which he tried to uncover the history surrounding the spread of Islam to many Islamic countries.

Ali believes the current tidal wave of Islam that emerged after the end of the Cold War is actually the fourth wave in a series of revivals.

According to Ali's theory, many countries that are now becoming Islamic were historically Islamic. He believes that wars and changes in governments and their power may have succeeded in suppressing Islam in many countries, but never completely rid these countries of the Islamic religion.

"The boundaries change, the people don't," he said.

The first wave occurred with the formation and orientation of the Muslim religion in an area of the Middle East called "the fertile crescent" during the years 570–634. This was followed by the crystallization from 634–870. During this time, Islam spread from Spain to India. After crystallization was fragmentation, from 870–1041, as different rulers came into power and began to battle over land.

The second wave began with the migration and renewal, from 1041–1405. Soon after, in the thirteenth century, Osman Ali started the Ottoman Empire. However, the Ottoman Empire suffered setbacks during the Mongolian Invasion and the Crusades. During this time "cities were overtaken, books were burned," and Muslims were pushed out of countries like Spain, said Ali.

The third wave brought on what Ali calls the consolidation and expansion, from 1405 1683. Ali calls this time, "the Zenith of Islam." At the height of the Ottoman Empire "all trade took place on silk routes through the Muslim Empire," said Ali.

According to Ali, two major problems for the Muslim Empire were the discovery of technology and the Europe's creation of navies.

"When the Europeans created strong navies for trade, it became irritant to the Muslim Empire. The discovery of gold in America caused a recession in the Ottoman Empire," he said.

By 1815 the Muslim Empire was under European domination. European colonization occurred by 1920.

"Dictators like Stalin used the idea of nationalism to conquer Islam," said Ali.

Ali says that the fourth wave began when British colonies in the Middle East gained independence in the 1940s. This wave has continued with the fall of the Soviet Union in the early '90s. But, he says, there are still Muslim areas that are not free yet, such as Tratistan, Ufa, and Dakistan.

According to Ali, there are 1.2 billion Muslims in the world.

At the end of the lecture, Ali accepted questions from the audience. When asked if he thought Islam was spread by force Ali said, "I don't agree with that... Islam has made sure not to go in and conquer for conquest's sake. Islam is mostly spread by association of trade and culture."

People's Liberation Army commended for assisting flood victims following Hurricane Mitch

If you think Hurricane Mitch was unmerciful and did enough damage to Nicaragua, Honduras and other Central American nations, wait until you read this. This past summer, China experienced one of the worst floods in its history.

The unofficial direct economic loss of the flood, which lasted more than two months, was at about RMB 320 billion (Chinese currency) or $40 billion American. The official death toll was a little more than 2,000 of which 400 were People's Liberation Army (PLA) soldiers and officers. However, reports from Hong Kong said the death toll was more than 10,000. More than 200 million of China's population, or about the equivalent of the entire U.S. population, was affected by the massive flood. Having personally seen part of the flood along the Yangtze River, I know exactly how devastating the flood was to the largest developing nation in the world.

Joe Li

Chinese government and the PLA have been under countless criticisms since its founding in 1949. These criticisms range from human rights abuse to trade policies. Whatever the criticisms may be (and I don't agree with lots of them), one can't underestimate the actions of the Chinese government this past summer when an unmerciful nature showed its ugly face in Central and Northeastern China. If it wasn't for the government's decisive actions to bring in millions of PLA soldiers to fight against the flood, I can't imagine how horrible the conditions would be.

During the flood, the senior leaders, including President Jiang Zeming and Premier Zhu Rongji, visited the regions numerous times. The government organized many activities to raise funds for the flood victims. The PLA soldiers, who are most known in the west for their role in the 1989 Tienanmen democracy crackdown, obviously proved who they really are. They were on duty 24 hours a day. They helped civilians evacuate to safe areas; they helped local governments set up tents as temporary schools so that kids could continue their education; they distributed emergency supply to peasants; they saved a young girl's life, who was wrapped around a tree on the edge of death because she was surrounded by water. On one occasion, a dike broke and the water immediately flooded a small city near Wuhan, Hebei. Prior to fixing the dike, the PLA soldiers, after several tries, jumped into the water and formed a human shield to try to stop the water... Oh, by the way, these soldiers don't get bonus pay like American soldiers do. What do they get? Some good words from senior leaders and their normal paycheck, which is less than $150 a month.

Fortunately the flood in China is all over now. Hopefully there will be no more floods in China. Not that the Chinese government and PLA soldiers won't help, It is just too much for a poor nation like China, or any other nation. In the mean time, I say that PLA soldiers do deserve some credit.

'Al Nuevo Mundo' honors go to Latin American leaders

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

On Friday, Chancellor David K. Scott and many others came together to recognize the 25th anniversary of the Bilingual Collegiate Program, and the new center for Latin American, Caribbean and Latino Studies. At the convocation, "Al Nuevo Mundo," honorary degrees were awarded to a handful of people.

Scott described the Bilingual Collegiate Program (BCP), and the new center for Latin American, Caribbean, and Latino Studies as two very important units at UMass, and expressed gratitude on the behalf of the entire Commonwealth of Massachusetts. The BCP, an academic support program for Latino/a students has been advising, tutoring and giving encouragement to students for 25 years and will now work in conjunction with the Latin American, Caribbean and Latino Studies Program.

Tenesha Horn, who was selected to speak by the Latino students, greeted the audience. Even though she is a freshman, she said, the program (BCP) has already made a positive difference in her life here at Umass and she is thankful for it.

The main speaker, Luis G. Perez, was the first Puerto Rican to be appointed a judge in the state of Massachusetts. He was also one of the few who was selected for an honorary degree from UMass.

"BCP began because the students cared, and now they are celebrating 25 years, I am happy for that, but there is still more, we need to open doors for our kids," he said.

During his address, Perez also expressed concern about cultural stereotypes. "Not all Colombians are dealing dope, and not all Puerto Ricans come to America and receive welfare. Most people just want opportunity," he said.

Among the others receiving honorary degrees were Dr. Antonia Pantoja, Ing. Pamon de la Pena–Manrique and Dr. Larissa Adler Lomintz.

At the convocation, two University staff members were honored with Chancellor's Medals, which is the highest honor that can be given for service to the University. UMass librarian, Pauline Collins, who was the Latin America Bibliographer at the W.E.B. Du Bois Library for many years was honored along with Benjamin Rodriguez. Rodriguez has been director of BCP since 1974.

A poet with a Nike slam

DANIELLE CRANO– COLLEGIAN

Recent legislation concerning Nike labor laws in Asian factories has sparked debate over the humanity of working conditions.

Martin Espada

I confess that I am a poet of situations. I have written poems for weddings, birthdays, and holidays. I wrote a New Year's poem for the radio. I wrote a poem for the 25th anniversary of a magazine, and so the number 25 had to be featured in the poem. I even wrote a poem called "Pitching the Potatoes" for an anthology of poems about potatoes. Then I was asked to write a poem for a Nike commercial...

Global Exchange, a human rights organization in San Francisco, has developed a "Nike Chronology" based on documentation of company labor practices in Asia. In March 1996, CBS aired a 48 Hours documentary on similar abuses in Vietnam. Nike workers were forced to kneel with their hands in the air for 25 minutes as punishment, another worker had her mouth taped shut for talking, and two more workers reported an attempted rape by a Nike factory supervisor at the Tae Kwang Vina factory. On March 8, 1997, International Women's Day, 56 women were forced to run outside the Nike factory in the Dong Nai province because they did not wear regulation shoes. A dozen women collapsed due to heat exhaustion and spent the day in the hospital. This incident was reported by Bob Herbert in The New York Times.

Then there are wages. Children in Pakistan, according to a study by Thuyen Nguyen, a Vietnamese–American businessman, revealed that Nike workers in Vietnam earn $1.60 a day, while the average cost of three meals a day is $2.10.

Global Exchange has also chronicled Nike's crackdown on the strikes in their factories, a predictable consequence of the struggle over wages. In January 1993, 24 workers accused of organizing a strike at the Sung Hwa Dunia factory in Indonesia were fired. Likewise, workers in the Assembly Production Department at the Wellco Factory in China struck for their full wages in March 1997 and were all dismissed.

The common response to reports that U.S. companies are operating Third World sweatshops is an acknowledgement that conditions are spartan, followed closely by the assertion that these jobs are nonetheless superior to anything found elsewhere in that particular country.

The Christian Science Monitor relayed these comments by Michael Hooker, Chancellor of the University of North Carolina–Chapel Hill, defending the university's multimillion dollar contract with Nike: "The working conditions, relative to what else is available to them, are really very good. So people are clamoring for those jobs." Nike spokesman Vada Mangager told The New York Times that "Nike workers earn superior wages and manufacture the product under superior conditions."

Yet, Global Exchange maintains that Nike did not pay the local minimum wage ($2.46 per day in Jakarta) to Indonesian workers until April 1997. Business Week reported on an internal audit at Nike which showed the company paid its workers in Vietnam 20 percent less than the minimum wage of 19 cents per hour.

This may explain why the workers at Sam Yang Vina factory struck in April 1997 for a raise of one penny an hour. As for "superior conditions," Nat Hentoff in The Village Voice cited that same internal audit, which "tells of a factory near Ho Chi Minh City where the level of carcinogens exceeded Vietnamese standards by six to 177 times in parts of the plant...77 percent of the workers are already afflicted with respiratory problems."

Nike's response to all the controversy, in (Bob) Herbert's words, is "an elaborate international public relations campaign to give the appearance that it cares about the workers." This goes hand–in–hand with "advertising campaigns that are so slick, so hip and so compelling that consumers feel that whatever the price, they must wear the product." Thus the Nike Poetry Slam.

A poetry slam is, of course, a staged competition among poets, part of the "performance poetry" or "spoken word" phenomenon which has developed an enthusiastic following in the youth market so treasured by Nike. The Nike Poetry Slam required that poets compete by writing verse for commercials in praise of certain female athletes — Nike athletes participating in the 1998 Winter Olympics.

This was part of Nike's larger ad campaign built around the female athlete, which a coalition of women's groups has identified as wildly ironic, given Nike's treatment of female workers in Asia.

The following is from Espada's letter explaining his decision not to write for Nike.

"I could reject your offer based on the fact that your client, Nike, has through commercials such as these outrageously manipulated the youth market, so that even low–income adolescents are compelled to buy products they do not even need at prices they cannot afford."

This is an excerpt from an essay in Zapata's Disciple, by Professor Martin Espada, professor of English at the University of Massachusetts.

Pitchshifter is the real "Genius" on Deftones' tour

By Michael Delano
Collegian Correspondent

DEFTONES/PITCHSHIFTER
The Palladium
Oct. 22

WORCESTER — Pick up any issue of Metal Hammer or Kerrang! magazine and flip to the concert reviews. One band consistently receives a perfect score and a glowing review of their live performance. The band is Pitchshifter and they definitely lived up to their reputation Sunday night as one of the opening acts, along with Quicksand and Mofotov, for the Deftones.

Pitchshifter guitarist Jim Davies is even more optimistic about the stage presence of his band. He would rate the band's live performance "11" out of 10, but is weary of bringing too many special effects to the stage.

"We don't really want to make it into a pantomime type thing," states Davies, even though he realizes that American audiences seem to be into live performances that are heavy on the extras. The band does hope to make some additions to their stage set on their upcoming tour of England however. Davies hopes these additions will "make [the stage] look as technologically advanced as the music is."

Davies lists Gravity Kills among the bands he has had the most fun touring with, but adds the band "gets along so well with Quicksand" and have been fans for a long while. Also, he describes the Deftones as "really great and such nice people."

Pitchshifter's latest album www.pitchshifter.com is a marked departure from their earlier records on former label Earache. Davies sees the change as more of an evolution and notes that "if you listen to every album you slowly get to the new one" and sees the band's previous release Infotainment? as the real turning point to the band's current more punk and techno feel.

As far as Pitchshifter's plans for the future Davies sees the next album as "a little less complicated and a bit more big beat" and notes a "big hip-hop influence" that they hope to use more. Also in the future could be a departure from this tour, as Pitchshifter was only scheduled to do half of the current tour and to be replaced by Snapcase. But it would be a crime to replace them, as their live performance was nothing less than an "11."

Lead singer I.S. Clayden introduced the band before spraying the crowd with silly string. The only calm to be seen in their half hour set was the opening notes of opener "Microwaved" off of the latest album. But as soon as I.S. reached the chorus he did a spin kick off of one of the speakers that sent the crowd into a frenzy. "D" Walters pounding drum rhythms were complimented by bassist Mark Clayden and his spirited headbanging. I.S. definitely put himself in touch with the fans as he stage-dived no less than three times. Selections from previous albums came in the form of "Virus" and "Triad," but the focus was mainly on www.pitchshifter.com, "Genius" and "Subject to Status" were both presented with remarkable accuracy to their recordings, and set closer "W.Y.S.I.W.Y.G." was dedicated by I.S. to all of the "freaks and weirdos in Worcester."

The Deftones also had no trouble in getting the crowd active. The opening few songs, which included "Root" and "My Own Summer" produced an energy level of the likes I have never seen before. The crowd was finally sedated by the relative slowness of "Mascara" which had everyone swaying back and forth and even produced a few lighters In the audience. Another crowd tranquilizer was "mx," which felt a little out of place following the likes of such heavy hitters as "7 Words" and "Engine No. 9" from the Adrenaline album. Vocalist Chino Moreno's stunning vocals were the highlight of

LIVE 1966: BOOTLEG SERIES VOL. 4
Bob Dylan
Columbia

There was a time when rock 'n' roll mattered. There's a great Bruce Springsteen song off of Born in the U.S.A., "No Surrender," where Bruce sings about "believing we could cut some place of our own/ With these drums and these guitars." Musicians like Springsteen could live and die by the vinyl record. It meant something to them — it spoke to them. "We learned more from the three-minute record, baby/ Than we ever learned in school," he sings in the same song.

Is it like that anymore? Do people really care about the disposable heroes and fads of music today? Do we learn more from "Wannabe" than we learn in school? Or are we content to let music not challenge us? I don't mean that music can't be just purely fun and instinctual, but have we given up on it as being connected to us in some emotional way?

With the release of Bob Dylan's Live 1966: Bootleg Series, Vol. 4, we are treated to a time when music was something that mattered. During the infamous show recorded here, the venue was turned into a minefield. We now have a record of a time when Bob Dylan changed the face of music, long before we fell into the rut of treating him as an aging icon, forgetting what exactly he did for music. Here, he is a daring young musician, reinventing form to the dismay of purists. For the music fan, this is all the reward we need.

Bob Dylan had started something when he first plugged in his guitar at the Newport Folk Festival, churning out a loud, rocking set, but pissing off the folk lovers in the audience. Dylan was breaking the rules of folk, bringing rock into the equation. From there on out, he was a marked man, getting heckled by the crowd after crowd. But he kept his act going, dividing his concerts in half, between folk and rock. He knew what he was doing.

The concert is therefore split into two discs, one acoustic and one electric. The dichotomy between the two discs is necessary, and highlights the love/hate relationship between performer and audience. The fans loved the first half, but many hated what he was doing with a full band during the second half. Both discs are great on their own merits, but the second disc is fantastic in light of musical history.

Musically, even without the politics or the historical angle, the disc is beautiful. It's recorded and mastered clearly, where each song is sharp and clean, and the microphones pick up little, necessary details from the stage and the crowd, like some fans clapping off time to throw off the rock section of the show. Songs like "Visions of Johanna" have a beauty that is only enunciated by the quiet setting, while "Tell Me, Momma" and "Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues" barrel along like someone out of control. The songs are precariously close to falling apart, but therein lies the beauty and the catharsis of the rock section.

"Judas," someone shouts at one point toward the end, rather unfairly. I mean, Judas betrayed the Son of Man; Dylan just decided to buy a Fender amp. But the venom, the hurt, is unmistakable. Dylan was supposed to be the savior of folk, but instead he was turning his back on the soft strum of folk and embracing the harsh clatter of rock and roll. "I don't believe you," Dylan slurs back, offhandedly. There's a sound in his voice that almost lets you in on his thinking: If they'd only stop and listen.

The Most Valuable Producer: Part I

Rap music's most quintessential elements reside within the sacred chambers of its producers. As much as the die-hard lyricist would argue otherwise, it is the beat that elicits lyrical potency. As the year creeps to a close, it is time to begin talk about hip-hops most prestigious award... MVP, Most Valuable Producer.

Although there have been many outstanding, neck- snapping achievements, hardly anyone has been quite as consistently bananas as DJ Primier. Basically anything he touches becomes a revolution in sound. Primo's staccato, piano-driven, horn-crazy beats have given him an immeasurable touch. His patented murk. The honey-dipped blunt smoke gives him away. As the darkness passes over, on steps the mad scientist, the rhythm bandit, the Abbot... the RZA. As a thick yellow cloud rushes through his nose like two smokestacks, his appearance is somewhat distorted. Masked by a black eye-cloak, his hallucinogenic stares reveal that the man in question is Bobby Digital, the RZA's physical manifestation of an alter-ego. On this project, the Abbot uses a Frankenstein-esque twist to bring forth this character. His movie, entitled Bobby Digital as well, explains RZA's scientific encounter with a substance that can re-create oneself.

The soundtrack, due out today, is the full-fledged workings of Prince Rakeem. Although the RZA has been relatively silent since Wu-Forever, his latest production efforts should refolster his status in the hip-hop elite. Not that he ever really slipped. On Meth's album, however, he is nowhere to be found (I'll he kind enough to forget "Retro Godfather"). His absence marks the first Wu solo album that wasn't enriched by his beats. Hopefully this trend will not continue. As we anxiously await Bobby Digital, beat junkies and sound hounds alike can only hope for the RZA to challenge that (almost) untouchable level of Primier.

Stay tuned as we continue the quest for hip-hops MVP...

McGee delights Iron Horse

KELLY FITZPATRICK / COLLEGIAN

The Pat McGee Band put on a spectacular show at the Iron Horse Sunday night.

PAT McGEE BAND
Iron Horse Music Hall
Nov. 22

NORTHAMPTON — Only hours after a spectacular sold- out performance at Boston's famed Paradise Rock Club, the Pat McGee Band traveled to the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton for an intimate showcase of their soothing acoustic rock.

Led by the powerful vocals of Pat McGee, the band has been called, "the most talented unsigned band in the nation," by MTV Online, and Sunday night only further supported this statement by their exhilarating performance.

The band is presently warming up for yet another relentless touring schedule, as they await the arrival of their live CD that is due in hit stores nationwide on Dec. 18. Recorded at the Bayou in Washington, D.C. and the Birchmere in Alexandria, Virginia, the release is being used to appease their loyal grass-roots following, while the band negotiates a major recording contract.

Sunday night featured the pleasure of being entranced by many of the striking rhythms from the bands only studio release, Revel.

The show also featured two solos, one by guitarist Al Walsh, a crisp James Taylor cover, and the other, a great rendition of "Walking Down to Memphis" by keyboardist Jonathan Williams.

The bands well-performed "Rebecca" re-energized the very respectful audience before ending the set.

Arriving back on stage, the band closed with an eclectic set of covers smoothly unified into one song that included everything from Bob Marley's "Buffalo Soldier" to Paul Simon's "Graceland."

The band's musical influences are just as diverse as their closing song. Walsh comments that they "come from so many different areas, the ones that we've listened to are really eclectic, anything from early 70s super-rock bands all the way through the '80s and '90s bands, and hip-hop." He further states that the band "loves to do music and see what's out there on the edge."

Mark Erelli and his band put on a heart-warming opening performance that was worthy of a solo-acoustic encore. It was a pleasure to witness such inspiring Pioneer Valley artists open up for such a sensational band. Mark Erelli's next performance will be at Northampton's mecca for local emerging talent, the Fire & Water Cafe, Thursday, Dec. 3.

The Pat McGee Band will be back in New England to once again jam the Paradise Rock Club on Monday, Dec. 28. However, for those that will be leaving the area for winter break, tour information may be found on-line at www.patmcgeeband.com. The Pat McGee Band is definitely an act not to be missed.

the show, and were best showcased through the concentration of songs on their second album, Around the Fur. Clocking in at a little over an hour, the set felt a little short, but Chino's sudden burst of energy for closer "Be Quiet and Drive" certainly left no one disappointed.

New York act Quicksand had an electric set with cuts from all of their albums. Everyone in the band showed incredible energy on stage, and personal favorite "Thorn In My Side" showcased Quicksand at their best.

Unannounced guest concert openers Molotov were completely unknown to me before the concert. My only briefing was from Jim of Pitchshifter who told me that "they're a band out of Mexico." Although most of their set was in Spanish and/or unintelligible, they did manage to have a very creative stage set-up. Two bassists and a guitarist were at the front of the stage while the drummer sat behind them. Not unusual, except the drummer was the main singer for the first few songs. The guitarist also provided vocals on a few songs, and later on the drummer took the stage to sing while one of the bassists took over his duties as drummer.

One final plea: don't bump Pitchshifter from the tour! Even though Snapcase is scheduled to take over, Pitchshifter's stage presence and technical efficiency is unparalleled, and their presence on the tour brings even more talent and diversity to an already stellar line-up.

■ Dylan

"Play this... loud," Dylan seethes to his backing band before kicking out the last song, "Like a Rolling Stone," to finish out his set. And with that, Dylan declares war on his audience, guitars raised like axes and drums beating out the war chant. If he couldn't convert them, he was going to beat them. "How does it feel," he's practically begging of the audience, "to be on your own?" He's almost accusing the audience of not being smart enough to understand — the audience is alone as a crowd, while the performer has his music. If they didn't want in, then they were the fools. You can almost hear him with blood in his mouth. A

Women's hockey ties UM cops

By Melissa Sherman
Collegian Correspondent

The UMass Police TRIAD team gave the Massachusetts women's ice hockey team a run for its money in Sunday's benefit game held at the William D. Mullins Center practice rink. The event proved to be a success, bringing in $550 for the club squad.

"Speaking on behalf of the team, we greatly appreciate the effort and support and time the UMass Police and everyone who came out to support us," junior co-captain Jenna Nolan said.

The police set the score in the first period at 2-1. Butch Hawkins led the police with the first goal of the game. The women were quick to catch up, as Kathy Mireault beat Mike Mernard to cut the lead in half at 2-1. Then, in the second period Nolan stepped up by scoring two goals for a 3-2 UMass lead. Beth Davis added an assist on one of Nolan's tallies.

Dave Foster and Matt Lee matched Nolan's two goals with a pair to put the TRIAD team in the lead at 4-3 at the end of two periods. Then, in the third period, the excitement continued as UMass' Molly Sherman tied up the score at 4-4 early in the frame.

The police went ahead as Bob Waskiewicz scored two more times put the TRIAD team up 6-4. However, Elisa Garvey and Mireault were quick to match those goals and send the game to a shootout. The game ended in a tie, however, as neither team successfully managed to score in the shootout.

Overall, it was deemed a success both on and off the ice. The turnout was good and it was a well-organized event. And, it appeared that the boys in blue enjoyed themselves too.

"Those girls were running us into the ice and along the boards, at one point I was 10 feet in the air before I landed smack in the net. They were real good competition and we wouldn't mind playing them again," Hawkins said.

Waskiewicz was a little disappointed because he said that pulled his team together early this year and hoped to raise $1000.

"We didn't raise what we hoped to, but the we had a great time and the raffle added to it and we're already planning another game if the women make it to nationals," he said "Anything we can do to generate support and money, besides the guys had a great time."

UM students ready for major tourneys

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Correspondent

When the New England Regional Pool and Table Tennis Tournaments are held on Feb. 6, at Fitchburg State College, UMass will be well represented with three worthy competitors (men's and women's pool representatives and a men's table tennis representative).

On Oct. 30, UMass held its qualifying round for the tournament, with the winners moving on to compete for the regional championship.

Christine Maxwell, the three-time defending UMass Champion in nine-ball, will compete in the New England Regional for the third time. Maxwell placed third in the regionals in '96 (a strong showing for a first-time competitor), but topped that by placing first in '97.

By placing first, Maxwell was then able to compete for the grand prize, the national championship, which was held at the University of Wisconsin-Green Bay, and consists of 16 regional champions. Maxwell finished eighth.

Maxwell is confident that she will again win the New England region and move onto the national championship, where she hopes to improve on last year's performance.

Maxwell is not the typical pool player. She does not practice constantly because of time constraints (with school being her No. 1 priority), but is able to maintain her skills with the few games she plays per week.

Tim Perry, on the other hand, fits the prototype. He spends 15-20 hours a week practicing shots to sharpen his skills, finding that there are not many people at UMass that give him stiff competition. At home, he plays approximately 30 hours a week at a local pool hall, where he feels the competition is better.

Perry won the UMass tournament for the third time this year, and finished third in the regionals in 1996-97, when he was not playing his strongest game because of the eight-ball format, but when the format changed to nine-ball in '97-98 he placed second, losing to the eventual national champion.

Perry feels he will see the defending champion again in the regional final, where he hopes to edge him this time around. Perry will play in tournaments throughout winter break to better his chances in pressure situations. Playing in front of a large crowd was new to Perry in the region al final, but playing in tournaments will allow the pressure to subside a little.

Alex Sukharsky will represent UMass in the table tennis regionals. As a first-time competitor, he is not quite sure what the field will look like, but feels as though his skills will make for a strong performance.

In 1990, Sukharsky came to the U.S. from Russia, where he learned to play table tennis at the age of eight. He took lessons for four hours a day, six times a week. Table tennis is very popular in Russia and because his older brother is a well respected player, it fueled Sukharsky to be on top of his game.

Sukharsky has a ranking in the United States Table Tennis Association, of which he is proud. He beat the qualifier for the regional tournament last year after the UMass tournament was held, and with that to build on, Sukharsky thinks that he will do well.

UMass men's swimming drops pair of NYC meets

By Jimmy Chen
Collegian Staff

Although it may have come a little too harshly, perhaps a lesson is a good thing right now for the Massachusetts men's swimming team, which lost both of its meets last weekend in New York.

Columbia defeated the Minutemen 166-134 on Saturday and St. John's edged UMass 121-120 on Sunday, halting their streak of 17 undefeated dual-meets.

In the Lion's den, Columbia overwhelmed the Minutemen from the start, winning five of the first seven events, including a two-second victory over the UMass 200 medley relay squad, which consisted of four of the strongest UMass swimmers: senior Brian Wisniewski, sophomore Billy Brown, senior Geoff Gear, and sophomore Chris Arsenault.

UMass came back behind three swimmers that won a pair of victories: senior B.J. Brannan in the 200 breast (2:10.68) and 500 free (4:49.29); Arsenault in 200 free (1:45.49) and 100 free (47.30); Wisniewski in the 200 back (1:56.63) and 200 IM (2:02.51).

Junior diver Ed Hefferon continued his streak of solid performances, and won the three-meter dive with a score of 270.525. Billy Brown also came out with a win in 100 breast (59.81).

"We had a good effort," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said. "We needed them to swim big and they did."

However, with majority of their returners coming back, Columbia took most of the second- and the third-place finishes for the rest of the races, winning two of them despite eight UMass first-place finishes.

"We just couldn't quite get over the hump," Yarworth said. "They just have too much for us. We don't have enough swimmers right now to be able to compete at that level."

Sophomore Matt Andrews and senior David Koritkuski were placed on the injured list with shoulder injuries. Kevin Raab has a knee injury, and Carlos Ramos and Rich Slinghuff are still competing with water polo team.

"Seven or 8 kids make a difference," Yarworth said. "If they're not there, they can't score points."

In the St. John's meet, UMass tried to bounce back but the hungry Red Storm swimmers were looking for a revenge. UMass, led with the usual dominant performances by Wisniewski, Brown and Hefferon, fought strenuously with the host as the whole confrontation came down to the last race, the 200 free relay. UMass came short and lost the race, as well as the dual meet, by 0.76 second.

"There are so many places to look at and say if this kid could just move up a place," Yarworth said after a one-point loss to St. John's. "[But] the kids that are swimming are swimming hard, yet we definitely are not at the level of program I expect here. UMass doesn't lose two meets in a row, we haven't done that for as long I can remember."

.., and 88 blocks. Lloyet collected 125 kills and 141 digs. Drennan also came through defensively tallying 167 digs, she also collected 272 assists earlier in the season.

The Minutewomen will have all this fire power returning for them next season, plus any incoming freshman for this spring offseason training and all of next year. UMass looks to make an impact next season in the Atlantic 10.

"I liked the way the season ended. We played well against Xavier and Dayton, but the off-season will be crucial to our development," Kenny said. "They have stuck together. We have everyone back We took both Temple and Dayton out of the top spot during the A-10 schedule, but we didn't make the tournament and that's something we strived for and we finished tied for fifth. We are one place away."

that has helped the Minutewomen get to the 5-0 mark, Newcomb also pointed out the performances of several of his swimmers.

"I heard a lot of good things about Becky Hunnewell when we were recruiting her, and I've been very happy with the way she's been swimming," he said. "Julie Alexander has also gotten off to an outstanding start and, being one of our senior captains, has a great work ethic. Elizabeth Risotto has set both backstroke record already, and to have a swimmer of her caliber is boost for the program. She's phenomenal to watch."

UMass will take the next two months to prepare and compete in a trio of invitational meets. The first in that series will take place on Dec. 4-6 when the Minutewomen will travel to Cambridge for the Harvard Invitational.

"One thing about the Harvard meet is that we're going to let them rest. However, it's still going to be a nice opportunity to get even better," Newcomb said. "Harvard has been one of the top teams on the East coast for years, so it's going to be a great opportunity for everyone to get better and get some experience."

The Minutewomen will then have to wait until the next calendar year for their next action. That will take place on Jan. 9, 1999 at the Sacred Heart University Invitational in San Juan, Puerto Rico.

"That's going to be more of a training thing. There's going to be a lot of hard work put into that trip between swimming and then lifting every other day," Newcomb said. "We're going to be really beat when we come back."

Spotting the best of college hoop's unknown talent

Brett Eppehimer can easily pull off the look of the average college student. At 5-foot-11, he blends in with most of his classmates. His crop of short, tousled, light brown hair was shaved down to a close buzz last year. His big brown doe eyes give him a boy-next-door quality.

But when he dons his No. 11 jersey and takes the court for Lehigh, Eppehimer transforms from Joe Average College Guy to his opposition's biggest problem.

Casey Kane

Eppehimer, Lehigh's shooting guard and a leading candidate for player of the year in the Patriot League, is one of college basketball's best players — at least one of the best ones most people have never heard of.

Voted by The Sporting News as the Patriot League's best scorer coming into this season, Eppehimer has the credentials to back that prediction up. Last season, he was fourth in the nation in scoring with 24.7 points per game, seventh nationally in three-pointers per game with 3.4 and 17th in free throw accuracy (87.7).

In the spirit of Eppehimer, and all the other players out there who don't get the same attention the Mateen Cleaves, Richard Hamiltons and Trajan Langdons of the world get, here's a quick look at some of the best unknowns in the game today (keep in mind some of these players' success is relative to the level they play on):

- Kashif Hameed: A 6-foot-8 senior center who will move to power forward this season at Iona. Hameed is a lock for the All-Metro Atlantic team. Last year's conference player of the year, Hameed averaged 15.3 points per game and a MAAC-high 2.5 blocks a contest.
- T.J. Lux: A Northern Illinois center/forward, Lux led the Mid-American Conference in rebounds last year with 11.1 boards per game, but has been, and will continue to be, outshined by player of the year favorite Wally Szczerbiak (the most famous player you've never heard of).

The 6-foot-9 Lux isn't so bad at the scoring game either, averaging 18.6 ppg. He started the year needing 484 points and 265 rebounds to become the all-time leader in both categories for the Huskies.

- Jermaine Jackson: Besides the conjures-up-the- memories name, Detroit has a proven floor leader in Jackson, who averaged 32.0 minutes per game last season. The 6-4 guard is the Titans best go-to option and a likely candidate for player of the year in the Midwest Collegiate Conference (which features UMass-transfer Inus Norville at Wright State).

Jackson, a senior, averaged 12.1 ppg and shot 45.1 percent from the field and should improve upon those numbers this season.

- Zoran Viskovic: Remember Bryce Drew, Valparaiso's NCAA tournament hero? Remember how he jumped into his father-coach Homer's arms when his team advanced to last year's Sweet 16?

Well, the sharpshooting favorite son has graduated, but Homer Drew isn't that worried. Because he has the V-Towers. And one half of that is Viskovic, a 6-11 senior center and the team's only returning starter.

Viskovic ranked seventh in the nation in field goal percentage last year at 62.9 percent and averaged 13.6 ppg. Considered by some scouts as the Mid-Continent's best pro prospect, Viskovic will team with Ivan Vujic, a 6-foot-10 junior college transfer, down low.

- Gregory Harris: Street and Smith's pre-season vote for the Northeast conference's most outstanding player, Harris is a speedy playmaker who should bring a wealth of experience to the Mountaineer backcourt. Harris, a 6-3 junior, averaged 15.5 ppg and shot 36.5 from long-distance last season.
- Michael Jordan: If it is possible to claim the spotlight in the Ivy League, Princeton has successfully done so in recent years. This year, Brian Earl and Gabe Luwellis should continue that theme. But Penn's Jordan, a 6-foot junior guard, could knock the spotlight a little southeast of N.J.

Jordan averaged 15.3 ppg and 3.0 assists a contest last year.

- Byron Mouton: A 6-6 sophomore forward out of Tulane, Mouton put in 19.3 points per contest and stole just under two balls a game as a freshman last year.
- Sian Simmons: The 5-11 senior guard led the Seahawks in scoring (15.7), rebounding (4.9) and blocked shots (17) last season.
- Steve French: The JUCO transfer will probably earn starting time at Maryland this season. Watch out for him. He was the No. 2-rated junior college player in the nation last year and should prove as a Terrapin that he is no fluke.

The Moore, the merrier for Minuteman football

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

It is a long way from Austin, Tex. to Amherst, Massachusetts wide receiver Jimmy Moore had a lot to think about as the plants below his plane window slowly changed from cacti to pine trees.

A little over a year before his arrival, Moore was playing football for Southern Methodist University, where he was within close range of his family, to whom he has always been close. After four games had passed in the 1997 season, the wideout had recorded eight receptions and two touchdowns for the Division I-A Cowboys. A season before, the promising sophomore was third on the squad with 20 catches and 307 yards, but his SMU career was to be no more.

The maroon number 80 of the UMass Minutemen was soon to be emblazoned upon the Texan's chest, despite the player's family ties in Austin.

"I'd never been on the east coast before, and it was really hard to make that decision," Moore said. "I'm just glad I got the opportunity to come to a good school — a great school like this one, with all the history it has."

That history, at least from a football point of view, has been rewritten since Moore's transfer.

After only one year, the senior wide receiver holds the school season record for receptions, with 68, and touchdowns, with 14, and is the only Minuteman ever to tally over 1,000 yards receiving.

Drawing from his Division I-A experience, Moore has always managed to find an open space in the defense when his quarterback, Todd Bankhead, needs it most.

"You learn some little tricks here and there," Moore said of his days at SMU. "You learn what the DB's tend to do on certain routes, and things like that. A lot of the same things apply here at UMass than did in Division I-AA. Football is football everywhere you go."

Perhaps of even more worth to Massachusetts, though, is the leadership that the senior has shown, guiding younger players through a tough season of close games.

"First of all, he's got great character. I just think he's a super kid, and he gives us some leadership," UMass Coach Mark Whipple said of his star split end. "All the receivers and all the defensive backs really look up to him because of the little things he's gained by playing at SMU and playing in Texas and learning the pass game. He's brought a lot more than just his catches and his touchdown receptions, but leadership as well."

Some teammates, like Bankhead, can directly count on him to pull them out of a jam, but others, like some of the freshmen on the team, benefit merely by watching Moore run routes and work hard. Altogether, No. 80 has helped the Minutemen earn an NCAA tournament berth for the first time since 1990.

"Todd knows [Moore]'s a go-to guy, and I think he's really helped the development of Adrian Zullo also," Whipple said.

For Moore, leading a young, successful team into the post- season is difficult, but being so far away from the family that has supported him since his days at Austin Reagan High School is even worse. Only once so far this season has his beloved kindred been able to attend a contest; that is, until this week, when the Minutemen travel to McNeese St. in Western Louisiana. The game will be played only four to five hours on the highway from Austin.

"I'm very excited when my relatives come around, and hopefully they'll be down there; it's within driving distance so they don't have to worry about flying and buying a plane ticket," Moore said. "They'll be happy to hear they can drive to this game, and I'll be happy too."

UMass receivers like Zullo and Steve Ley will turn to Moore in this crucial game to see how the veteran reacts. Having recorded eight catches for 89 yards against Wyoming as a sophomore, Moore has been tested by tough competition before. These playoffs will be a perfect cap to what has been a dominant season for the senior.

Overall, when the senior reflects on his decision to leave Texas for Massachusetts, he gives a content grin. He knows he had a key decision to make that could've easily changed the course of his life forever. He seized the day then, and hasn't looked back since. Quite possibly, his life is, in fact, forever altered by his stay here at UMass.

"There are no regrets," Moore assures the Minuteman faithfuls a couple of days before he joins the team on a plane to Louisiana. "I've had a great time."

Hockey squad to face Vermont

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

If the Massachusetts hockey team can take care of business tonight in Burlington, Vt. in a non-conference matchup with regional rival Vermont, then the Minutemen will reach the .500 mark for the first time this season.

UMass (3-4-1 overall, 2-2-1 in Hockey East) has been playing its best hockey of the season over the past few weeks, and will ride into go up there and see what we can do."

While Vermont is coming off a 5-3 win over Cornell on Saturday night, UMass defeated Union 4-2 in their last time on the ice. In the meeting between the two schools last year here in Amherst, the Catamounts won the game in overtime on a fluky goal from the red line.

After struggling last season, Vermont is back this year with a potent offensive attack that will surely test the UMass defense, a unit that has been one of the best in Hockey East so far this year. Senior Jason Reid leads UVM with 10 points, while sophomores Philippe Choiniere and Andreas Morborg each have nine points.

The Minutemen will be led offensively by junior alternate captain Jeff Blanchard, who leads the club with eight points. UMass seems to have finally broke free from its offensive woes, as evidenced by the four goals scored against Union, and will rely on a balanced attack in order to be successful against the Catamounts.

Between the pipes, sophomore netminder Markus Helanen has been solid for UMass all season. The reigning Hockey East Player of the Week will once again be looked upon to hold down the fort for the Minutemen. Should Mallen elect to give Helanen the night off tonight, freshman Mike Johnson seems to be ready for his first taste of collegiate action.

Tonight's game will also start up a brief three-game road swing for the Maroon and White. After the Vermont affair UMass will head west to Colorado this weekend for a pair of games against No. 3 Colorado College and the Air Force Academy.

The Minutemen are coming off a seven-game homestand in which they went 3-3-1, but leaving the friendly confines of the William D. Mullins Center for the first time in a month should not phase UMass.

"We've always played pretty well on the road, so we've just got to keep it up," Blanchard said. "We've just got to stick to the basics and keep working hard."

Game time is slated for 7:30 p.m. at UVM.

Women's swim team up to 5–0

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

Thanks to a 151-90 thumping of St. John's on Saturday afternoon in Jamaica, N.Y., the Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team improved to 5-0 on the season.

The perfect start is the best for the Minutewomen in 15 years, when UMass started out 7-0 en route to a 10-2 final mark in the 1982-83 campaign.

The Minutewomen won the meet against the Red Storm on the strength of a total team effort. Five different swimmers captured first place finishes, and the 200 free relay team was also a winner.

"[Another] indication of the work that this team has put in is how they get along," Massachusetts women's swimming coach Bob Newcomb said. "They're great with each other, and you can see that positive attitude carry over into the relays."

Freshman Anne Detloff led the way for the Minutewomen by taking firsts in both the 50 freestyle and 100 backstroke. Juniors Lia Lansky and Marci Hupp won the 1000 free and 200 individual medley. Other winners for UMass included freshman Andrea Kazanjian, who won the 100 fly and sophomore Julie Dragon, who took that 100 breast.

"Julie continues to improve with every meet. That's something she has done for the past year and a half. She's just seems to get better and better each time out, and she has more confidence now," Newcomb said. "Andrea has done a great job in the sprints and has helped us out in the relays. Anne has done a lot of different events. They may not be ones that necessarily are her favorites, but she does it because she's a team player."

Overall, Newcomb was pleased with the performance by his squad against St. John's as well as the 5-0 record that the Minutewomen now sport.

"I'm very proud and happy of the team. They've worked very hard [to be 5-0]," he said. "St. John's was a little down and we took advantage of that. We just tired them out and we seem to be getting faster and faster with each meet."

"The effort that the team has been putting in is reflected in the record," continued Newcomb. "It's [the record] a good indication [of the success of the team].

Although it has been a team effort

UM women's volleyball finishes strong after tough start

Meyers, Hogancamp set to lead Minutewomen to an A–10 reign in 1999

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

An average season. That is what some might call the Massachusetts (15-15, 12-8 in Atlantic 10) volleyball team's 1998 campaign, but it was more than that. It was a chance for a group of volleyball players to become a team, to grow and to learn together.

What is the best part of the entire 1998 season for UMass? The effect it will have in 1999, because every single member on the UMass roster will return.

What UMass coach Bonnie Kenny said early in the season becomes much more of a factor now then it did back then. She felt that this team has the potential, if it stays together to play as a unit for over 500 days. This is the brightest light at the end of the tunnel for the Minutewomen.

Kenny can also see that this team has grown, and not only the four true freshman, but also the team as a unit, and how they experienced certain things like starting a season 2-7 and coming back to win 15 of their final 23 matches to finish .500 overall—stealing games from No. 8 BYU and No. 4 Arizona in their pre-conference schedule—and winning crucial A-10 matches like Dayton and Temple.

"These kids realize they can beat anybody. Experience is the biggest factor. They've taken games from several teams including Virginia Tech, Xavier, Arizona and BYU and we're right there now with George Washington and Rhode Island," Kenny said.

Most of all these players have learned to rely on each other and their coaches on and off the court.

This team by no means is satisfied with the final result of this season. The goal at the beginning of the season was to qualify for the A-10 tournament in Pittsburgh, but the Minutewomen fell just short of this goal as they tied for fifth in the conference with GW, with a 12-8 record.

The A-10 only accepts the top four teams for its tournament, so UMass was left out.

"This season is not a disappointment. There were too may improvements to call it a disappointment, but we have an unsatisfied feeling as a team," freshman setter Heather Holtsberg said. "We are definitely on our way to A-10s next year, because we are extremely determined to get there."

The Minutewomen have a solid base for this eventual goal. It includes their two returning co-captains, juniors Karl Hogancamp and Jill Meyers from Huntington Beach, Calif. These two players have been the emotional leaders, floor leaders and offensive leaders this season.

"I loved the commitment I received from Jill and Kari. They were great leaders, and when it was game time, nothing else mattered," Kenny said.

Hogancamp was exceptional this season. In her 110 games, she tallied 419 kills along with 462 defensive digs. She has been an offensive leader for the team as well as defensive mastermind, and is 25 digs away from becoming the all time leading digs leader in UMass volleyball history. The California native has also been one of the most consistent players on the team. Hogancamp had a streak of 17 consecutive double-doubles, which just ended Saturday against Dayton.

Jennifer Drennan and the gritty UMass women's volleyball team wrapped up their season this weekend.

"Kari Hogancamp has been exceptional. She started this year at a brand new position, and she also had double- doubles in 85 to 90 percent of her matches. In this sport the team goes where your outside hitter goes," Kenny said.

Meyers can't be overlooked when it comes to the Minutewomen's offense. She recorded 441 kills, 268 digs and 83 blocks, while also playing in all 110 of the team's games this season. Despite the great offensive campaigns of both Meyers and Hogancamp, they still feel that they would have enjoyed a trip to the A-10 post-season.

"This year we're tied for fifth, but all the teams are getting stronger, but we need to worry about our team first, and hopefully we'll make A-10s next year," Hogancamp said.

The Minutewomen also had four freshman who contributed heavily to the success of the team this year.

Holtsberg, as a freshman setter, was a crucial piece of this year's puzzle. She played in 93 games and tallied 1,016 assists in her inaugural campaign. The Illinois native also improved her defense throughout the course of the season as she finished with 187 defensive digs.

Janeen DeMarte also developed into an effective outside hitter. DeMarte improved her offense as she finished with 113 kills, which was an average of 1.30 per game and 217 digs.

Celia Wiste and Lauren Vander Veen both were effective — sometimes brilliant — off the bench. Despite only playing in 74 of UMass' games, Vander Veen tallied 113 kills, 32 digs and 35 blocks. Wiste was only involved in 35 games but she also recorded 21 kills and 22 blocks.

"Heather has improved our team a lot, our hitting percentage has gone up. Our kills have gone up," Kenny said. "Janeen has also been key, she has helped us in several different rotations. Lauren had five or six brilliant matches this season. It's there they just need to make it happen. They need to come prepared to play for every game."

There is also a sophomore class that has been productive all season for the Minutewomen. This class includes last year's setter and defensive specialist Jenny Drennan, a red shirt freshman Lymarie Llovet and second year middle blocker Rebecca Hasson.

Hasson recorded 208 kills, 196 digs, and 88 blocks. Llovet collected

U.N. says hunger in Cambodia is severe

PNHOM PENH, Cambodia (AP) — Children in Cambodia are suffering malnutrition at a rate comparable to levels in famine-struck North Korea, the U.N. food agency's country director said yesterday.

Though North Korea is suffering from a simple lack of food, a faltering economy in Cambodia combined with weak health care and education is causing similar levels of malnutrition in children, said Ken Davies, the World Food Program's country director. "The problem is so bad that it is only a little worse in North Korea," Davies said. "The situation is much worse than most people recognize."

According to a recent survey, 49 percent of Cambodian children under age 5 are stunted by lack of food and 20 percent suffer from acute malnutrition.

By comparison, a similar survey of North Korean children under 7 found that 65 percent are stunted and 16 percent suffer from acute malnutrition.

The food program is currently supporting 1.7 million hungry Cambodians — about 15 percent of the population — with food-for-work and direct assistance programs, but Davies said he fears there are still plenty more that are not getting enough to eat every day.

'Nappy Hair' book causes school furor

NEW YORK (AP) — A white teacher who gave an accidental children's book called "Nappy Hair" to her mostly black and Hispanic third-graders was removed from her classroom after parents complained and threatened her.

Ruth Sherman, 27, was transferred out yesterday after a tense school meeting Monday night.

"The term 'nappy' is generally derogatory and not every parent felt that using a book like 'Nappy Hair' in a classroom setting, although the author was black, was a wise way to go," said Board of Education spokesman J.D. LaRock. LaRock said that despite some "provocative passages," the book has a positive message. Told in a gospel-like, call-and-response style, the book is about a little girl with the "nappiest, fuzziest, the most screwed up, squeezed up, knotted up" hair. It received rave reviews, including one from The New York Times.

"The idea that it is a racist book is ridiculous," said the author, Carolivia Herron, who believes the book should be used to teach racial diversity. "This book is a wonderful celebration of nappy, African-American hair."

The district superintendent told Sherman to report to district headquarters instead of her classroom, pending further investigation, according to Ron Davis, a spokesman for the teachers union.

Unsafe toys for Christmas

MASSPIRG warns unsuspecting parents of dangerous toys

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

Yesterday Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG) held a press conference alerting consumers to unsafe toys on the market this holiday season.

Bonnie Barclay, a campaign manager for MASSPIRG, said that often parents are oblivious to the safety hazards of most toys.

"What parents have to understand, even when a toy is labelled with a warning you have to realize what is wrong with them. Lots of parents think, 'My child is smart enough,'" Barclay said.

If a product has parts that could be choked on, said Barclay, parents must really be extra cautious. She said often toys meant for older children get into the hands of younger siblings.

According to a press release from MASSPIRG there are still 13 toy deaths every year from unsafe toys.

The annual MASSPIRG "Trouble in Toyland" report lists 24 dangerous toys discovered during a survey of toy stores across the country. At least five of the toys violate the Consumer Product Safety Commission's (CPSC) small parts standard designed to prevent choking deaths. Four toys violate the CPSC's new small ball regulations. Other toys narrowly evade the small parts standard, but still pose choking and other hazards.

Some toys on the list include: Babe the Pig and Friends Bedtime Babe by Equity Toys (small parts), Free wheeling ContractTeam by Fisher Toys (small parts), Toys-R-Us's Movie Star Gold Jewelry (small parts), and Toteables Glow in the Dark Fashion Accessories by Phantom Effects (toxic).

The report highlights the choking hazards associated with toys. The group also warned parents of the choking hazards associated with balls. The 1194 Child Safety Protection Act banned small balls for children under three with a diameter of less than 1.75 inches for sale since Jan. 1, 1995. Since January 1994 at least five children have choked to death on small balls.

Noel Woolrich, Nurse Manager of the Emergency Department at Cooley Dickinson said another cause of accidents is balloons.

"People don't think of balloons. A child will bite it and it will pop. In shock they gasp and end up inhaling the balloon," she said.

Springfield nurse charged with murder

By Jeff Donn
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. — A former nurse at a veterans hospital was charged with murdering three patients with drug injections and trying to kill two others.

Prosecutors said Kristen Gilbert of Setauket, N.Y., used epinephrine — also called adrenaline — injections on all five patients at the hospital in Northampton. They also are investigating other patient deaths.

Gilbert, 31, could face the death penalty if convicted. She was charged with three counts of murder in a federal grand jury indictment unsealed yesterday. She also was charged with attempted murder, retaliating against a federal witness and obstructing justice.

The sister of one of the victims, Henry Hudon, said her brother had begged not to be left in the ward the night he died. She said Hudon, a 55-year-old schizophrenic Air Force veteran who had been admitted to the ward just hours earlier with the flu, feared that patients were being killed.

"We thought it was just ranting," Christine Duquette said. An autopsy later showed her brother died of poisoning from epinephrine, a drug that can overstimulate the heart.

Authorities did not offer a motive, but Gilbert admitted to "erratic" conduct when she was convicted in January of making a bomb threat to the hospital. Prosecutors described her then as a perennial deceiver who faked attempting suicide.

Her attorney in the bomb case, Harry Miles, did not immediately return telephone calls seeking comment yesterday.

Hunger awareness campaign kicks off in time for holidays

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

With the winter holidays approaching, students at the University of Massachusetts are helping less fortunate people of Western Massachusetts by funding a sixth annual "Fill-A-Bus" Clothing, Food and Toy Drive at the Student Union.

Today and starting the week after Thanksgiving break, a PVTA bus donated by UMass Transit, will be parked outside the Student Union from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. accepting non-perishable food items, clothing, and especially toys.

The drive is sponsored by the UMass Community Service Program in conjunction with the UMass Women's ice hockey team, Buddies, MassPIRG, Share and Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority.

The Community Service Program was created to help students become more aware of the opportunities in serving the UMass community. Flavia Stanley, the coordinator of UMass Community Service Program, feels that this type of drive is especially important around the holiday seasons.

"Food is an important necessity, but toys are especially important in the holiday season," Stanley said. "I want to encourage people to donate toys because a lot of families can't afford to go Christmas shopping."

Last year, the "Fill-A-Bus" fundraiser helped to raise over 800 pounds of food — equivalent to filling a complete PVTA bus with food items. They hope to exceed the goal this season and have encouraged local dorms to participate as a form of community service.

"If we are able to collect a lot more food than we expected, we'll donate it to the foodbank of Western Massachusetts," Stanley said.

Also involved in the project is Kristin Wilmarth, coordinator of Hunger and Homelessness Campaign for MassPIRG. For the past few days, she has participated in passing out pamphlets and managing the bus. She feels the drive is an effective means for getting the word out to students that homelessness is an issue of concern.

"The drive is to raise awareness of issues closer to home than people really think," Wilmarth said. "People think big cities have the problem of poverty, but it exists in smaller towns too."

Wilmarth says they are raising a lot of food already, and their goal is to be a presence among students so they'll be more aware of the need to raise items for the drive during the week after Thanksgiving.

"We just want people to know that we're here, so they will go home for Thanksgiving break and return with the food items to donate," Wilmarth said. "We want to meet our goal, and we plan on doing whatever it takes for a good cause."

STDs declining at UMass; UHS continues to educate

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Despite increasing general awareness about the dangers of unsafe sex, and a recent decline in the transmission of sexually transmitted diseases (STD), many University of Massachusetts students continue to engage in unsafe sexual practices.

University Health Services (UHS) has recently increased its efforts to educate the student body about the dangers of unprotected sex, as well as the importance of proper medical attention.

According to Dr. James Abel, a pediatrics/adolescent health specialist, during the course of one year about one out of every four sexually active UMass students will come into contact with a sexually transmitted disease. While most sex education programs focus on AIDS, the most commonly spread STD is the human papilloma virus (HPV), more commonly known as genital warts. "Fortunately," Dr. Abel said, "the rate of STDs among UMass' students is dropping profoundly."

He attributes this decline to UHS's comprehensive sexual education programs. Students with the Basic Health Plan — which includes all full-time students living on campus — are eligible for confidential HIV testing, counseling and free physical examinations. At the UHS Pharmacy, student can confidentially purchase contraceptives, for a price far cheaper than those sold in drug stores.

According to national statistics, between 1 in 500 and 1 in 500 college students is infected with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS. Unfortunately, while most students are familiar with the dangers presented by this virus, they continue to ignore the possibility of "lesser" diseases like HPV or gonnorhea. In the safe-sex workshops held several times a week at UHS, students learn that while many STDs can be treated with antibiotics, viral infections can not.

Despite these opportunities to be educated about safe sex, many students continue to hold erroneous beliefs about sexual health. For example, there are widely-spread rumors on campus that somewhere between 80-90 percent of students graduate with an STD, when in reality only about 85 percent of graduating students are sexually active. Likewise, many students fear casual contact with people who are HIV positive, when it has been widely established that the disease cannot be contracted through everyday behavior.

Many students joke about the concentration placed by Health Services on sexual practices. A recent Collegian comic strip parodied a male student being told that his illness is caused by a pregnancy; the "Safer Sex Menu," distributed at safe-sex seminars (with selections such as "dry humping" and "nibbling each other through clothes"), is most commonly seen taped to bathroom stalls. Still, Dr. Abel asserts that the administrative support for preventative health care is the primary reason for the recent decline in STDs.

"There is a general interest in sexual issues among the faculty and staff [at Health Services], rather than just a handful of doctors," he said.

Unfortunately, the University's openness about sexual issues may lead outsiders to believe that the problem is worse than it actually is. Just as many colleges with strict drug and alcohol policies are often given the stigma of "having a drug problem," schools like UMass that are forthcoming about sexual matters can be perceived as breeding grounds for sexual misbehavior. The opposite is true. Studies have shown that the rate of sexually transmitted diseases is, in fact, much lower at UMass than at other schools.

One of the most common complaints about sexual education is that it promotes "safe" sex rather than abstinence. UHS is quick to point out that it does not endorse pre-marital sex. When asked what message he would give to UMass students about safer sex, Dr. Abel said, "Enjoy masturbation — it's fun, it's free, and it's with someone you trust who never says no and never gets pregnant."

Philip Morris raising prices following tobacco settlement

By Skip Wollenberg
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Philip Morris USA, the nation's biggest tobacco company, raised wholesale prices of Marlboros and its other cigarette brands by a record 45 cents a pack Monday, the day the industry sealed a mammoth legal settlement with the states. No. 2 R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. had an identical increase and others were expected to follow suit on what one analyst called the biggest U.S. cigarette price hike ever.

Analysts had widely predicted a price increase of 35 cents to 40 cents a pack to pay for the $206 billion tobacco settlement to resolve states' claims for reimbursement for providing health care to sick smokers.

The nation's five biggest tobacco makers signed the settlement Monday with 46 states, the District of Columbia and five U.S. territories, under which they would make payments over 25 years to settle unresolved state claims for Medicaid reimbursements. The companies had earlier signed four separate deals to settle claims by Mississippi, Florida, Texas and Minnesota for a combined $40 billion.

The increase Philip Morris announced to its wholesale customers, which takes effect immediately, was slightly larger than expected. David Adelman, tobacco analyst for Morgan Stanley Dean Witter, said smokers may be stuck with an even bigger price increase of about 50 cents a pack as distributors and retailers add a nickel to the wholesale price hike.

He estimated the national average price of cigarettes would rise to $2.45 a pack from the current $1.95, an increase of 25.6 percent.

"This is the biggest tobacco price increase in dollar terms in the history of the United States," he said.

Crime rate is down in New England

By Scott Andrews
Associated Press

The rate of serious crime dropped more in New England than in any other region in the nation from 1996 to 1997, according to the latest FBI crime statistics.

The rate of eight serious crimes, including murder, burglary, rape and car thefts, dropped 5.5 percent in New England. The rate for the nation as a whole declined 3.2 percent, as the total number of crimes went down for the sixth straight year, according to the statistics released Sunday.

Some criminologists in the region said there is no clear explanation for the dramatic declines in New England. They warned against reading too much meaning into a one-year drop-off.

"I think there are just natural fluctuations. And these fluctuations don't mean much unless there are long-term trends," said Richard Moran, a professor at Mount Holyoke College in Massachusetts.

The FBI reports that the six-state New England area had the lowest crime rate of any region in the nation in 1997, with 3,370.7 crimes for every 100,000 people living in the region. Moran said that is partially due to the region's low gun ownership rate. The highest crime rate of any region was in the South Atlantic, which includes Florida, Georgia and Virginia, with 5,849.1 crimes per 100,000 residents.

In New England, Rhode Island had the most improved crime rate, with 3,654.4 crimes per 100,000 residents. That represents an 8.5 percent drop overall due to an 8.9 percent decline in property crime. The state's murder and manslaughter rate, however, remained unchanged.

New Hampshire was the safest state overall, with the lowest property and violent crime rates. Its crime rate was 2,639.6 crimes per 100,000 residents.

Vermont was the second safest, with 2,828.2 crimes per 100,000 residents, followed by Maine, with 3,131.7 crimes per 100,000 residents.

Connecticut continued to be the most dangerous state in the region, despite having the biggest decline in violent crime. Its crime rate was 3,984.3 crimes per 100,000 residents. The state had the highest property crime, murder and overall crime rates in the region.

In Massachusetts, the crime rate dropped 4.2 percent, less than in any other state in the region. Its crime rate was 3,675.2 crimes per 100,000 residents.

Violent crime there was, by far, the highest in the region. It rose 0.3 percent despite a 26.9 percent drop in the murder rate. The state's 5.1 percent drop in property crime was the smallest decrease in New England.

Despite criminologists' lack of clear explanations for the fluctuating crime rates, they offered several possibilities. "If I had a guess, and it would be just a guess, I would think that the impact of the booming and growing economy has probably done more to reduce crime rates than anything else," said Roland Chilton, a professor at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst and president-elect of the American Society of Criminology. Moran and other scholars have suggested many other possible reasons, including a decrease in the population of young men in the region, a decline in gun battles over drug-dealing turfs and an increasing revulsion toward violence in inner-city neighborhoods. Politicians, including President Clinton and congressional Republicans, have given themselves credit, saying an increase in the number of police officers, tougher gun laws and longer prison terms have made the difference.

Economists say earnings will fall next year

By Dave Skidmore
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The government reported the worst drop in corporate profits in nearly nine years yesterday, even as stock prices hovered near record highs.

Economists predict earnings could fall again next year and say they fear the market is vulnerable to another downturn, perhaps worse than the Dow's 19 percent plummet between July 17 and Aug. 31.

So why did the Dow Jones industrial average begin the week by shouting to a record high?

Many attribute the market's startlingly swift recovery since early October to a shortsighted focus on recent interest-rate cuts and on a spate of corporate mergers, including Tuesday's announcement that America Online will buy Netscape for $4.2 billion.

"Investors have overdone it. They were overly pessimistic a few weeks ago and they're overly optimistic today," said economist Mark Zandi of Regional Financial Associates in West Chester, Pa. "There's no reason to believe investor psychology won't switch back the other way at some point next year," Zandi said.

In any case, yesterday, the Dow average retained most of its extraordinary 22.8 percent runup between Oct. 1 and Monday. It fell 75 points, or 0.8 percent, to 9,301.

Companies' after-tax profits fell 1.8 percent from July to September in the third quarter's decline of the past year, the Commerce Department said yesterday. They're down 6.2 percent from a year earlier, the worst drop since 1989.

A third of the world's economies, including most of Asia, remains mired in recession. As a result, the U.S. trade deficit is likely to set a record this year and another in 1999 and growth should slow appreciably.

However, other analysts believe investors are well aware of the risks and diminished prospects for next year, and instead are looking at the longer term.

"I don't think investors see a slowdown in 1999 as extending for a long time," said economist Norman Robertson of Smithfield Trust Co. in Pittsburgh.

Clinton pardons turkey; impeachment still looms

By Sonya Ross
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Declaring that Americans have a lot to be thankful for "even in the darkest times," President Clinton saved a turkey's life today, then turned his attention to more serious matters: adoption, Iraq and the impeachment vote hanging over him. Before an audience of children in the White House Rose Garden, Clinton used his power as president to keep one turkey off the dinner table this Thanksgiving. This year's lucky chucker — a 45-pounder bred in Minnesota — will be sent to the petting zoo at Frying Pan Park in Fairfax, Va.

The snow-white turkey seemed happy about the reprieve. At first he resisted as representatives from the National Turkey Federation struggled to hoist him onto a table, but then he flapped and strutted about before striking a dignified pose beside the president.

"This is the most adventurous turkey we've ever had," Clinton said. "With this presidential pardon, our friend here will retire... to live out the remainder of his years surrounded by friends, not peas and sweet potatoes."

Today's turkey pardon was the 51st since President Truman began the practice in 1947. But President Lincoln also was said to have issued a pardon once, to placate son Tad. Clinton credited Lincoln with issuing the first official Thanksgiving proclamation during the Civil War, saying it went a long way toward healing the divided nation.

"Mr. Lincoln reminded us that, even in the darkest times, we all have something to be thankful for," Clinton said. "We are fortunate this Thanksgiving to live in one of the more prosperous times in our history. But we should never forget there are still people in our nation who need concern and caring."

Afterward, the president was joining first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton at an event focusing on adoption and his administration's efforts to move more children out of foster care. Among those scheduled to attend were Anthony Williams, the mayor-elect of Washington, who was adopted, and some two dozen families who will have their adoptions finalized at the White House by a judge. The president was also ordering the Department of Health and Human Services to launch an Internet service to help find permanent homes for children in foster care.

"The president and first lady have long been committed to expanding adoption. Now they are instructing HHS to use the powerful tool of the Internet to make adoption more accessible and easier for Americans," said White House press secretary Joe Lockhart.

Clinton returned to the White House Monday evening after spending the day among admiring throngs in Guam, a U.S. territory that rarely sees presidents. The visit capped a five-day Asia trip that included stops in Japan and Korea.

The Clintons are expected to spend the Thanksgiving holiday as they usually do — sequestered at Camp David, the presidential retreat in the mountains of western Maryland.

Between heartwarming moments today, Clinton was getting updates from his foreign policy advisers on a U.N. weapons inspection dispute with Iraq, and working on his responses to 81 written questions from the House Judiciary Committee.

Clinton aides anticipate delivering those answers to Congress by week's end — without saying whether they consider that date to be Friday or today, when most Americans are preparing for the long Thanksgiving holiday weekend and are less likely to pay attention to the issue.

Hyde has said he hopes the committee can finish its work the week of Dec. 7, and if necessary, the full House would convene the following week for an impeachment vote.

Regarding Iraq, Defense Secretary William Cohen said Monday that a U.S. military strike remained possible against Iraq if President Saddam Hussein refuses to fully cooperate with U.N. requests for critical documents.

The dispute involves documents on chemical and biological weapons programs that Richard Butler, the chairman of the U.N. weapons inspection commission, has sought since last Friday. Iraq claims the documents either don't exist or don't relate to weapons programs.

About 24,000 American troops, 210 aircraft and one aircraft carrier remain in the Persian Gulf region ready to carry out any airstrike.

House wants an end to impeachment

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Henry Hyde, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, hopes the panel can complete its work on impeachment the week of Dec. 7 and the House can convene the following week to vote if necessary on President Clinton's fate, Republican sources said Monday.

But Hyde's timetable, as virtually everything else in the final stages of the nation's third presidential impeachment inquiry, is subject to numerous unsettled issues, ranging from constitutional matters to logistics.

As an example, before adjourning last month for the elections, lawmakers gave Speaker Newt Gingrich the authority to call the House back into session "whenever, in his opinion, the public interest shall warrant it."

That provision was crafted with impeachment proceedings in mind. Now, though, Gingrich is a lame duck, and as a practical matter, has ceded power to Rep. Bob Livingston, tapped by Republicans to succeed him.

Christina Martin, Gingrich's press secretary, declined to say how the outgoing speaker would respond. Other officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said he probably would yield to Livingston's wishes. At the same time, Gingrich could also appoint Livingston to preside over the House for any such proceedings. Nor is it clear whether House approval of censure — an alternative to impeachment suggested by many lawmakers — would advance to the Senate for a vote there. That depends on how the measure is drafted.

That is not the only perceived problem with censure. "I don't think there is any constitutional authority for us to do anything other than impeachment," Rep. Bill McCollum, (R-Fla) a Judiciary Committee member, said recently on CNN.

Several lawmakers have said recently that while the GOP-controlled committee is likely to approve at least one article of impeachment on a party-line vote, the House would reject it. Livingston has said he, like Hyde, is eager to have the entire issue resolved by the end of the year.

"If it requires a vote in the House of Representatives, I'd be prepared to ask Newt Gingrich, as the current speaker of the House, to call us in," he said in an appearance Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press."

But apart from the committee, little effort has gone into planning the final stages of the impeachment drama.

Reno says Gore did not lie to investigators

By Michael J. Sniffen
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Janet Reno concluded yesterday there is "clear and convincing evidence" Vice President Al Gore did not lie to campaign finance investigators and she declined to order further investigation by an independent counsel.

"The evidence fails to provide any reasonable basis for a conclusion that the Vice President may have lied," Reno advised a special court. "There are no reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation is warranted" into an allegation that Gore lied to Justice Department investigators last year about how a Democratic media fund was financed.

It was the second time in a year that Reno refused to have an outside prosecutor examine Gore over his telephone fund-raising or what he said about it. For Gore, it removed a potential obstacle to his ambition to run for president in 2000.

White House spokesman Joe Lockhart said President Clinton "believes the vice president has always acted within the letter and the spirit of the law."

Gore spokesman Christopher Lehane said, "The vice president is pleased."

Republicans were not.

"Once again, the Attorney General has failed to follow the law," said Rep. Dan Burton (R-Ind). "For the past two years, the attorney general has made it clear she is committed to protecting the president." Burton faulted her for rejecting the advice of FBI Director Louis J. Freeh to order an independent counsel, which Freeh has been advocating for more than a year.

Steve Forbes, a would-be Republican presidential candidate in 2000, said, "This raises the question of Ms. Reno's fitness to remain in office." Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa) suggested asking a court to order Reno to turn the case over to a counsel.

Reno vowed her 120-member campaign finance task force would continue the investigation that has already charged 14 people, including prominent Democratic donors and fund raisers.

"Today's determination does not mean that our work has ended," Reno said in a statement. "We will continue to vigorously investigate all allegations of illegal activity."

Indeed, she is in the midst of 90-day preliminary inquiries about President Clinton and his former deputy White House chief of staff, Harold Ickes. She must decide within two weeks whether independent counsels are needed to continue those probes. Officials say no counsel is likely to be named in the Clinton matter, which involves whether he and aides illegally financed issue advertisements during his 1996 re-election campaign.

This inquiry into Gore began in July when his counsel turned over handwritten notes by Gore's former deputy chief of staff, David Strauss, about a Nov. 21, 1995 meeting which Gore attended. The notation "65 percent soft/35 percent hard" called into question whether Gore knew that some of the money in a Democratic media fund for issue advertisements was coming from so-called hard money, which can be used to promote specific candidates but which cannot be raised on federal property.

For brussels sprout farmers, it's NAFTA that stinks

By Martha Mendoza
Associated Press

SANTA CRUZ, Calif. — Pity the poor brussels sprout. The mini-cabbages smell bad, they're almost always overcooked and kids hate them. Grown-ups aren't crazy about them, either. Now, the little vegetable has emerged as one of the losers under NAFTA. Along California's central coast, where 93 percent of the nation's brussels sprouts are grown, the North American Free Trade Agreement could spell the end of a tight-knit group of second and third-generation brussels sprout farmers.

"It's simple math," said Steve Bontadelli, shaking a tender, marble-size vegetable in his hand as if he were rolling dice. "In Mexico, they pay workers $6 a day. That's what we're paying per hour. We just can't keep up."

Five years ago, before NAFTA, most brussels sprouts served on American tables were grown in foggy, oceanside fields in San Mateo, Santa Cruz and Monterey counties. Since the trade agreement between Canada, Mexico and the United States, an increasing number come from Mexico.

"If you look broadly at NAFTA, it's been good for farmers and ranchers in Mexico, Canada and the U.S.," said John Skorburg, a trade specialist at the American Farm Bureau Federation, the nation's largest farm organization. "But if you look at specific commodities, there are winners and losers."

Bontadelli made his index finger and thumb into the letter L and planted it on his forehead. "That's me," he said. "Loser." Bontadelli grows 400 of the approximately 3,500 total acres of brussels sprouts fields in the United States. His 11-year-old son and 6-year-old daughter are the fourth generation in the business.

The scores for this preseason meet were rather low compared to regular season competitions, but this is only the beginning. Most of the gymnasts didn't throw in all of their tricks, and took it easy on Friday night. At the first meet of the season on Dec. 5, the Minutemen will unleash their hidden skills at the UMass Open in order to retain the first place spot they earned at the meet last year.

Johnson has his work cut out for him as many freshmen, and even some veterans, that sat out last season are showing promise, with many of them scoring higher than last year's competitors. But with the depth of this team, making the NCAA Regionals this season would appear to be as easy as a walk in the park.

Boxers v. Briefs

Seth makes a brief statement

The debate between boxers and briefs is an age old one that has had a sometimes bloody history... I hear that's what really started the Civil War.

I am a briefs guy. It's now public information, and all of you out there taking office pools now can divvy out the cash where it belongs.

Having said that, I know that I can only speak for myself. Other people are welcome to make their own choices on what to wear underneath their trousers based on their own experiences. I can only speak on the behalf of the great "tighty–whiteys." and I can only speak objectively about why Jason Trenkle is always wrong.

Now, being the newer of the two choices of underwear, the briefs are obviously more technologically advanced. Their stream–lined design is ideal for aerodynamics — why do you think Olympic swimmers never push off with parachute–like boxers dragging behind them? Sure, the swimsuits they wear aren't exactly briefs, but the only real difference is the material.

One myth which is in favor of the archaic boxers is that they are better because they give the genitals "room" to move about as they desire. This is a dramatically overrated quality, as briefs must be purchased large enough so that, upon wearing, they don't strangle those which they are made to conceal.

Often overlooked in the decision between the two is the control factor. From the male point of view, it creates a very embarrassing moment when that "special girl" knows you're very happy to see her. The tighties let you feel good about what you're seeing while keeping you from looking like a walking hat rack.

Seth Koenig and Jason Trenkle

You all remember that night–marish scene from grammar school where the teacher calls on you while you happen to be thinking about something else; namely that low–cut tank top that Mary Sue is wearing across the room. What the strategically placed text–book did for you then, the briefs can do for you now.

Aesthetically, the briefs offer all that boxers do. Although briefs traditionally come in the simple white variety, they are available in all colors, from indigo to aquamarine. Also, no pair of boxers could ever boast the action sequences that appeared on the historical "Underoos" briefs for children that featured favorites like "He–Man" and "G.I. Joe."

Now that's quite an argument. Say it loud, say it proud: the official briefs motto is, "No matter how hard things get, briefs keep everything in control." Or, in an even worse attempt at a phallic reference: "Get down with briefs when things are looking up."

Jason steps into the ring with his boxers

In his much heated attempt to make an argument, Seth has overlooked the fact that boxers were named after the high quality canine breed which means "protector." So, when it comes to protection of the most private belongings, man's best friend is the only way to go.

In other regards, boxers have always signified support and strength, whereas the old–fashioned "tighty–whiteys" cut the oxygen supply and "strangle the baggage till it's blue in the face."

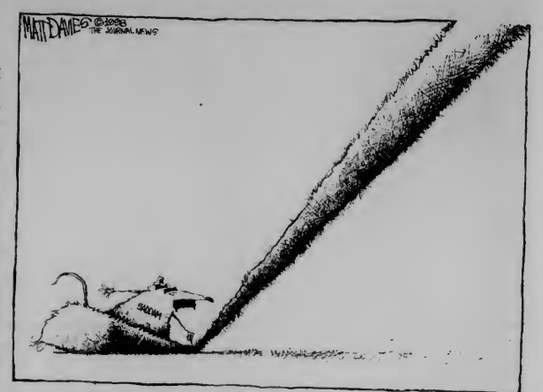
In a more shrewd manner of speaking, the average happy– go–lucky–boxer–wearing consumer tends to be more "fully loaded" than those individuals with a "brief" outlook on life. This also goes to prove that the first surviving people on this planet were able to successfully reproduce because of boxers.

The organ in question is sort of like a plant: it needs light to grow. If it doesn't receive the nutrition that it needs, it becomes dull and shriveled. Boxers are like the light; they provide this nutrition and allow the plant to grow and produce "seeds" which will later become a new blossoming flower (and if this flower is a smart one, it will choose boxers over briefs as well).

For some of you this is making no sense, but I ask you to remember when your mommy and daddy told you about the "birds and the bees." Well, what they didn't tell you was the "bees" wear the boxers. How do you think Sugar Ray Leonard became known as the boxer that "stings like a bee?"

Bees find the need to protect their "stinger" but also need it ready–in–hand for any "unexpected encounters." The "birds" need to protect their eggs and do so by wearing briefs. It was never intended for the bees to wear the briefs, so we should not confuse the two.

When it comes to comfortability, boxers are the preferred choice. Briefs give such an uncomfortable wedge, I couldn't imagine why anyone would want to have the uncomfortable stimulation of their genitalia being "stuffed like a Thanksgiving turkey."



Boxers not only offer comfortability, but they are also more appealing. They come in all different types of sizes, shapes, colors, and fabrics. And because of their patented design, when boxers get worn out, you can cut them up and use them for a tapestry. (Believe me, I know people who've done this.)

People also tend to be more open with boxers. You can walk down the hall with them on, go running with them, and wear them almost everywhere without feeling embarrassed of what you have or don't have on.

You can take my advice or leave it; boxers are the way of the '90s. They give people a "fully loaded" aspect on life, and they offer the comfort and guarantee that you will not find someone asking you, "How the hell did you get the bums over the hotdog?"

Hunting days are here again

Ah yes, autumn in Vermont: the sight of changing foliage, dead animals, and men with high powered rifles and shotguns. High powered rifles and shotguns? Of course, it's hunting season in Vermont, and there is nothing better than going out into the woods and tracking and killing as many living things as you can aim at. Many fathers take their sons out to see the extremely (and frighteningly) popular sport of deer hunting.

I happened to be in Vermont the other weekend (don't ask why), and I saw several things that really disturbed me. The major thing that was pretty disconcerting to me was the heavily armed and heavily intoxicated men roaming beside the interstate with guns ready, looking for the perfect buck. (I have yet to reach a good conclusion regarding the reasons why a male deer is called a buck, but who the hell cares anyway?)

I was pretty nervous when I saw people with weapons about 20 feet away from my truck as I headed on down the road. The men were dressed in their stylish orange caps, pants, shirts, vests and boots, and I came to the conclusion that they were hunting because I couldn't see a prison inmate number stamped across their backs and their hands and legs weren't shackled together.

My only question was, "Why hunt along the interstate?" I had never seen anyone in my many years of watching ESPN hunting shows hang out by a highway to bag a deer. Then again, I had never been to Vermont during hunting season, so I probably should have bought a travel guide or something.

Actually, these men could have been doing the deer a favor because if it did make it to the highway, the deer would be struck by a car and probably killed. On the other hand, these guys could have been demoralized after a day of real hunting, so they started drinking and were waiting for an easy target.

The other scary thing about these hunters was that they were using really, really, big shotguns. Now don't get me wrong, as much as I dislike the prospect of hunting I am not going to put it down (that much). However, hunting with a rifle and hunting with a shotgun are two totally different things. A rifle takes some skill and practice to shoot. A shotgun is something that Stevie Wonder could hunt with because as long as your back isn't facing the target you will kill something with a shot gun, whether it is an animal or one of your hunting buddies.

After I had passed the men by the side of the road, my eyes gazed across the landscape, and I saw a big field full of cows. I started to wonder why people didn't hunt cows. Not only are cows large and brightly colored, they also have about 10 times the meat of a deer. Then I realized that if men hunted deer than they couldn't strap them to the roof of the car and take them home to "the wife" so she could make stew and all sorts of other yummy deer products.

> " I started to wonder why people didn't hunt cows. Not only are cows large and brightly colored, they also have about 10 times the meat of a deer."
> Brian Lohnes

As we continued deeper into the belly of the beast I realized that guns and ammo were a huge part of the state economy. I pulled innocently enough into what I thought was a gas station only to realize that I was at, "Randy's guns and ammo and Mobil." That's right folks. There was a gun shop in the gas station.

I went inside to meet the business genius behind it all, but the clerk told me that Randy was out hunting (surprise, surprise) and that he would be gone for a week. As I exited the store I noticed a large scale. I asked the clerk, who was busy polishing his, "Dirty Harry Special," what it was. He told me that it was a scale to weigh the deer with.

Apparently, the deer have to meet a certain weight to be "legal." Forgive me for being stupid, but what if it is too small? Unless there is some new drug called "Reviveadeer" the weight issue doesn't matter all that much.

What I expect from a convenience store has been pushed higher than I could ever forget. The next time I go into the Hadley Mobil looking for a hunting rifle, I will surely be disappointed. Even the supermarkets in Vermont stocked ammo for just about every gun made since the Civil War.

So I guess that explains why Vermonters are fixated with firepower and killing stuff. If it was that easy for me to arm myself, I would probably have a really nice gun rack in my truck and a rebel flag license plate. Then I would buy many, many guns and boxes of ammo for myself and my roommate. There's just no telling when I might run into one of those rare Orchard Hill black squirrels, and there's no telling how much fun it would be for my roommate and me to wander the length of Route 9 swilling bottles of Wild Turkey and shooting at anything that moves.

If you have a gun, or the urge to go hunting, or for that matter the urge to go to a gas station to buy a gun, please don't go to Vermont because those poor animlas have enough stuff to worry about.

Double standards for athletes?

To the editor:

I don't understand why Monty Mack was let off the hook when he assaulted a young woman from New York who was also a student from UMass? Did UMass pull some strings to help their star player? Or maybe the judge gets season tickets to the game or was paid off. I understand that most "show cause" hearings are supposed to be heard by a magistrate and not by a judge; why did this judge hear the case? And by the way, who paid for the legal counsel since he is on full scholarship?

It seems that they are sending wrong messages to the athletes, that you can brat or assault anyone, especially a woman and can get away with it because the University will protect you. This woman is an African–American sister, so where were all the brothers (X–men) when this brother was beating up this woman?

Childcare for students needed

To the editor:

I'm one of the lucky ones. My teaching assistantship salary of just over $800/month (after taxes) is just enough to cover full–time daycare costs at an off–campus facility. Fortunately for me and my two–year–old daughter, my non– student wife has a good job, and with her salary we are able to enjoy the finer things of life like eating, sleeping with a roof over our heads, clothes, and the occational diversion. We live comfortably, if not extravagantly. We are lucky.

Many married and single parents at UMass, however, are not so lucky. They are struggling to meet the demands of childcare, studies and work. Affordable childcare facilities are woefully inadequate in the UMass area. Many daycare centers close to the University have long waiting lists and they are all expensive, if one earns only a teaching assistantship salary. Out of a total of 78 slots to serve a campus community of 24,000 students, only 26 are subsidized and affordable for low–income parents. Even if a subsidy is available, paying for life's other necessities is very difficult for many student parents. The results are often large debt and/or welfare. With the new welfare laws, even this option is more limited than ever. If my wife was unable to work, I could not study at this University. Like many UMass graduate students, we would be living below the poverty line.

If the University of Massachusetts' mandate as a public university is to offer higher education to low–income students, including those with children, then affordable childcare services are not an option but a necessity. This necessity is not being fulfilled at this University. Since money is available and a space in Skinner Hall is suitable for at least a temporary flexible childcare center until a more permanent location can be obtained, the administration should designate this space as a childcare center. This would add urgently needed childcare services for up to 40 children per day.

This state already has enough elitist Harvards, MITs, and other private universities and colleges that are largely inaccessible for the average student parent. If UMass is really to be an institution that is "family–friendly" and that is accessible to low–income students, it should prove it. This university needs an affordable, flexible childcare center now!

Sheik is dull, Boyzone blah, '80s teen flick compilation

COURTESY G. SEVIL SERT

Peter Murphy's haunting voice dominates his newly released EP Recall.

RECALL
Peter Murphy
Red Ant

This newly released EP should give us a taste of what is to come when Peter Murphy's first solo LP since 1995's Cascade. Like fellow colleagues Love and Rockets, Murphy uses electronica to his advantage, creating a disco dance–ish ambience. However, the main strength of Recall is not the electronic experimentation. Rather, it is Murphy's beautiful, haunting voice on which the disc chooses to rely. "Rollcall– Recall" starts off the five–song EP, followed by "Indigo Eyes '98," both songs containing no samples from their original versions. "Big Love of a Tiny Fool" (inspired by a Turkish song entitled "Buselik Makamana") is another powerful song carried by Murphy's voice. "Surrendered" has potential, and the album closer, a live version of "Big and Tiny" has Murphy singing a capella.

Produced and mixed by Murphy, Bill Rieflin, and KMFDM's Sascha Konietzko, and Tim Skold, Murphy has a wealth of talent on his team, and if the new album is anything like we hear on Recall, fans will not be disappointed. A– (Kevin Monahan)

HUMMING
Duncan Sheik
Atlantic

A disappointment for the most part. The follow–up to Sheik's hugely popular debut is a dull production full of slow–moving, string–filled tracks. Only the tracks on which Sheik's voice resembles the low–pitched style of David Sylvian are worth listening to again. "Varying Degrees of Con–Artistry" resembles Sylvian's '80s hit, "Red Guitar." Despite clever references to pop's greatest songwriters — John Lennon, Nick Drake and Brian Wilson — "Say It All" fails due to a lackluster arrangement. An out of place jazz track closes out this soon to be forgotten disc. C+ (Matthew Nixon)

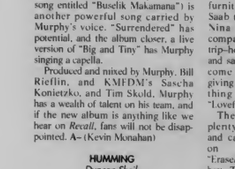
WHERE WE BELONG
Boyzone
Mercury

"Wow, these guys are so cool! They're totally, like, cute and stuff! They, like, rock!" Spoken like a true pre– pubescent girl.

Do we need to be subjected to this trash? We've been nice, we've been good. We really did not do anything to deserve this. "Where they belong" is not on our stereos.

The latest Backstreet Boys incarnation, Boyzone, has made it to the top of the charts in the UK already, and now threatens to invade the US with their formula dance house, top 40, blah, blah, blah, drivel. That's the bad news. The good news is that they will probably vanish from the public's memory faster than you can say New Kids on the Block but you never know—those "girl power" t–shirts have not vanished from the clearance racks quite yet. F (K.M.)

TRANCEPORT
Paul Oakenfold
Kinetic/Reprise



It is no longer just the records that are important, it is the disc–jockey and what he or she does with them to turn an evening into a beat–laden experience. Paul Oakenfold is one of the world's best DJ's and was recently voted number one DJ in the DJ Times readers poll.

This mix CD documents Oakenfold's ability to find the newest, thumping dance records and create a compelling non–stop mix ready for turning the home into an instant club space. Trance is characterized by pulsing rhythms and slowed down sections that regain speed before an energetic conclusion. Mixed live to tape, it is possible to hear the pops given off by the vinyl records he uses as his source.

Records that fill New York's Twill and San Francisco's Spundae are given a home on CD for the first time. Every track is absolutely fantastic and guaranteed to get everybody movin'. Featured music includes remixes of material from Gus Gus, Binary Finary and Paul Van Dyk amongst others. A– (M.N.)

GRAN TURISMO
The Cardigans
Mercury

A very clean sounding disc — evocative of sipping Absolut amongst IKEA furniture after a drive in the Saab through pine forests. Nina Persson and company dabble in trip–hop this time and sadly do not come close to giving us anything near "Lovefool."

There is plenty of fun and catchy stuff on this CD. "Erase/Rewind" is pop at its best. The current single, "My Favorite Game," has an infectious "eh–eh" effect, but is oddly placed at track 8. The title of the album comes from the video game of the same name and is about feeling like a tourist in one's own life. B (M.N.)

BOYS + GIRLS
The Promise Ring
Jade Tree

The Promise Ring's 1997 album Nothing Feels Good was practically a pop breakthrough, moving away from the emo sounds of their debut, but keeping their puppy dog looks on love and girls. It was hands–down one of the best albums of the year. It was fun, head–bobbing music.

On their new three–song e.p., the Promise Ring have taken a big step back, retaining the pop, but keeping none of the head–bobbing excitement. It seems like their just going through the motions.

Lyricist Davey vonBohlen can still write an evocative phrase, looking at things like a kid who still believes thunder is the sound of angels bowling. "But then I'd say, 'Storms are born really far away/ Somewhere west of LA/ Where birds have kids like crazy/ Seagulls and turtledoves," he sings in "Tell Everyone We're Dead." Such an abstract romantic outlook is synonymous with the Promise Ring, and it continues here.

But the music just doesn't hold up. The Promise Ring are now on their third bassist, and this year's model isn't that great. As overlooked as it is, the bass holds the key to catchy pop (next time "MmmBop" comes on, listen to the bass holding it together — or don't. It's really an annoying song).

The last song is the awful "American Girl," which bears no relationship to the Tom Petty song (unfortunately). Swimming in a melody–less soup, vonBohlen repeats "American girl" over and over again. If only it were Tom Petty's "American Girl." If only this were the real Promise Ring. C (Mike Messaros)

IN THEIR EYES: '90s TEEN BANDS VS. '80s TEEN MOVIES
Various Artists
Rhino

The liner notes to this cover compilation reads, "John Hughes was in no way involved, nor did he approve of or participate in this project." Why not? It's not like his work is at peak performance anymore. Or is he too busy writing Home Alone 4: DSS Steps In?

It may look like fun, but a ska–version of the Cars' "You Might Think" is not "just what we needed." The bands featured on this compilation ages range from 9–18. We get treated to mangling versions of songs from our favorite '80s films such as Yello's "Oh Yeah" from Ferris Bueller's Day Off (covered by Crazy Glue), Echo and the Bunnymen's "Bring on the Dancing Horses" from Pretty in Pink (Round House), and Peter Gabriel's "In Your Eyes" from Say Anything... (The Stinky Puffs). It would have been a better idea to compile the original tunes. The Gadjits cover of Simple Minds "Don't You (Forget About Me) is decent, but the novelty of this album blinks out quickly like the smoking light at the end of Say Anything... D+ (K.M.)

ORANGE RHYMING DICTIONARY
Jets to Brazil
Jade Tree

When Jawbreaker broke up a few years ago, the teenage poets of the world let out a collective, dispirited sigh. Who else would put their problems into words? Jawbreaker had this ability to construct harsh but melodic sounds around lyrics that were seemingly pulled right out of a diary. How will the future generations of teenage poets make it through high school?

Jets to Brazil released their first album, Orange Rhyming Dictionary. Marking a return to songwriting by Jawbreaker's frontman, Blake Schwarzenbach, the album had the hopes of every fan pinned to it.

Unfortunately, those expecting a Jawbreaker redux will be disappointed. Blake's lyrics have gotten more adult and oblique, while his music has gotten a dirty, classic rock feel to it at points. This is not the West Coast pop we are used to.

"We are the high street service trays/ Coming to take you away," sings Schwarzenbach in the first lines of the album. So much for welcoming us with open arms. Phrases like this pop up throughout the album, almost throwing up walls when we try to penetrate a song. Schwarzenbach has changed his singing style, and even his writing style, so that the band sounds like a new version of the Psychedelic Furs. In the first song, Schwarzenbach sings about his "expery– may–antal bay–athroxn." Whew.

But once in a while that couplet or line jumps out, like the defining line of a journal. "Love come like an axe to all this ice and set me free," he sings in "Morning New Disease." "I am dreaming of a life and it's not the life that's mine/ In a stolen car I rocket west out past that Jersey line," Schwarzenbach sings later in the song, in a line that could have been stolen from Springsteen (I mean, stolen cars and Jersey? Springsteen's got copyright on singing about that).

The last few songs on the album are easily the best. Beginning with "Conrad," a song about a woman checking into a hotel to kill herself. Schwarzenbach writes with such restraint and care, singing with so much understatement, it never becomes heavyhanded. "Warming her wrists in promising water/ Somebody's love, another one's daughter/ Readies herself, apologizing to the motel maids." The album closer, "Sweet Avenue," ends things on a gentle acoustic note. These are songs of a teenage poet grown up, looking for new heartbreak. B (M.M.)

MY SCRAPBOOK OF FATAL ACCIDENTS
Jawbox
DeSoto

I love Jawbox. Love them.

In 1997, Jawbox finally called it quits after about six years of obscurity. After years of putting out difficult, complex music, being picked up by Atlantic, and subsequently dropped, the band folded up shop. Bill Barbot and Jay Robbins are continuing on as Burning Airlines, but that same magic just ain't there.

I had almost forgotten how much I liked Jawbox, how much I tried to rip them off in my music. They had this off– kilter charm to their harsh pop music that was at once exhilarating and impenetrable.

So now, after subtlety fading into the background (even more than before), they come back with a 22 song collection of unreleased, rare and live tracks, drawing mostly from their later days.

Songs like "Static," a song off of Novelty and rerecorded for the band's Peel Sessions, is given a nice little lift from Zach Baroukas' muscular, off–beat drumming (the song was originally done with former drummer Adam Wade). "Cooling Card" and and the new, previously unreleased "Apollo Amateur" show off the bristling, exciting energy of the band.

The end of the collection is filled with covers off of various tribute albums that one may not have bought only for Jawbox. Their 1991 cover of R.E.M.'s "Low" shows its age because of the one guitar power chord set up (this was before Bill Barbot joined the band), while their cover of the Cure's "Meathook" is quirky, filled with upright bass and keyboards.

While not the definitive look at a greatly overlooked band, this album is the perfect balm for those still wallowing in the break up. A (M.M.)

Vigorous enthusiasm at Mullins

By David Katzoff
Collegian Staff

A TRIBE CALLED QUEST
William D. Mullins Center
Nov. 23

Just prior to the show, I had the privilege of listening to Q–Tip, Ali Shaheed and the Last Emperor speak about a variety of topics concerning hip–hop culture. During this panel discussion, I noticed a distinct transformation in Q–Tip's demeanor. The questions that circulated around the room, ranged from various women's issues, to rap music's commodification in mainstream society. As the debate intensified, Tip seemed to turn from a quiet, introspective thinker into a distinctly eloquent and at times humorous speaker. Even Ali, who is usually more reserved with his speech, was seen waiving his hand wildly trying to intervene a comment. This type of energy was significant because it was carried over to the show.

After a compelling performance from Virtuoso, Akrobatik and Mr. Lif (more on them in the coming weeks), Tribe stormed out with vigorous enthusiasm. Up–playing the UMass theme, each member sported hockey jerseys and various other Minutemen gear. Phife entered the stage with his quote–of–the–day verse "she attended UMass and she passed every class." Obviously the crowd was immediately amped. From there, they followed with a fantastic array of classics selecting from all five albums. Throughout the performance, Phife's five foot antics kept the crowd rowdy yet amused, while Tip's innate charisma seemed to liven under the bright stage lights. Despite the unpublicized squabbles (evident in the Oct. 10 show in Worcester), the chemistry between Tip and Phife on this night was unparalleled. At one point, when the "El Segundo" bassline sounded, Tip turned to Phife and began reciting an old Jerks Boys joke. Consequently, Phife began laughing uncontrollably and was late in his rhyme delivery. This was naturally a welcomed flaw that enhanced the overriding feeling of a purely fun evening.

Overall, A Tribe Called Quest can be remembered by UMass students for their years of excellence, topped–off by an outstanding final performance at the Mullins Center.

NHL fighting on decline; stars benched

As any hockey fan should be, I am a big supporter of the NHL putting itself into a more physical mold. Now, I appreciate a clutch poke check or solid forechecking as much as the next fan, but there's nothing like a vicious body check or solid one on one battle between two heavyweights to get the momentum pumping.

This is why this past Saturday, I looked on in delight as Boston and Washington dropped the gloves, squared off, and proceeded to kick the crap out of each other. Something like this gets the players to come together as a team, to stick up for one another, and to play their hearts out every time they hit the ice. The melee proved to be an exciting start to a great game, which Boston finished in overtime, 5–4.

Matt Despres

But when does this type of violence cross the line? New league disciplinarian Brian Burke seems to have found many instances, as player suspensions are seemingly being handed down in record numbers. Burke's latest sentence came down upon Los Angeles forward Matt Johnson, who has been suspended for an astonishing 12 games for his attempt to injure Ranger defensemen Jeff Beukeboom. The Johnson incident is just the latest of unpaid vacations courtesy of Burke. Richard Zednik, Sean Brown, Peter Worrell and Andrei Nazarov are just a few of the players that have been caught in the last few weeks alone.

Burke is exactly what the NHL needs. There are far too many cheap shot artists running around free, putting the careers of others in jeopardy. He has done a splendid job thus far, and shows no signs of letting up. I'm all for letting the boys play, but that line needs to be drawn, and Burke has found the spot.

• As for the rest of the league...

• The league's most anticipated homecoming will now have to wait until next spring, as Brett Hull will take a seat when his Dallas Stars travel into St. Louis to face the Blues. Hull, who is leading the Stars with six goals and nine assists through 15 games, skated with St. Louis for 10 seasons and left in the off-season in hopes of joining on with a cup contender. Hull cited a bruised kidney as his problem, and is currently listed as day to day.

• Alexander Mogilny, who had jumped out to a solid start with the Vancouver Canucks this season, with 17 points in 19 games, will now be out four to six weeks with a strained right medial collateral ligament. With Pavel Bure already at home whining like a little girl, and Todd Bertuzzi nursing an injury, watch and see what happens to the Canucks with "Alexander the Great" out for a month. Yikes.

• How about the offensive juggernaut that is the Chicago Blackhawks? 39 goals in 20 games. Ouch... expansion strikes again.

• And if that's not enough, look no further than the Southeast division, currently the armpit of the NHL. Carolina sits on top with a 8–10–3 record, not usually a mark associated with first place. If you think this is a sign of how badly the talent in this league is diluted now, just wait until next year when Minnesota, Atlanta and Columbus join to round out the "Original 30." I feel sick already...

• How about that Keith Jones, eh? Since being sent to the Flyers, Philadelphia has gone 4–0, with Jones netting the game winner against Florida in overtime on Sunday. Jones may not grab the big headlines every night, but is a consistently good player whose arrival and Philly's change of fortunes is no coincidence, as the Flyers have pulled ahead of the Islanders and back into the race for first in the Atlantic division.

• After 18 season's as one of the NHL's best, it could be all over for Bernie Nicholls. The veteran center was cut by the San Jose Sharks this weekend. The move prompted the 37-year-old to step back and consider his future. It might be smart for Nicholls to step down, as much as you hate to see a great player end it that way. If indeed this is all she wrote, then he will finish up 26th in NHL history in points with 1,209 in 1,127 games.

• Kudos to the Toronto Maple Leafs, who are turning their first run through the Northeast division into a highly successful campaign. With no game last night, they now sit alone atop the entire Eastern Conference.

• My pick for game of the week: the New Jersey Devils at Dallas tonight. Two great teams, both among the NHL's best, and a marquee goaltending matchup: Ed Belfour vs. Martin Brodeur. Should be a good one.

Vermont stings UMass again

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Jeff Turner and the UMass hockey team visited University of Vermont last night in an attempt to reach .500 this season.

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The last time the Massachusetts hockey team beat University of Vermont was 27 long years ago at the same Gutterson Field House where the two old rivals faced off last night.

True UMass hadn't won in 11 tries, and last night they made it 12. The Minutemen fell victims to the hockey gods for the third straight year, losing to Vermont 2–1.

UMass hockey coach Joe Mallen talked before the game about the series between the two schools.

"We have lost the last two at home in overtime and a close 4–1 loss here in Burlington. It should be a great game, our forwards match up well with their defenders, and our defenders match up well with their forwards. In net Markus [Helanen] has been playing great and they also have a very solid goalie in net who has played well," Mallen said in a pre–game interview on WHMP.

The battle Mallen referred to was between UMass sophomore net–minder Markus Helanen who went into the game with a 2.33 GAA (goals against average) and a 3–4–1 record, having played in all of the Minutemen's games, and Vermont's sophomore goal keeper Andrew Allen, who went into the game 2–1 and with a 3.61 GAA.

This would truly be one of the stories of the night. But the biggest story was the lack of scoring in the first two periods. Through 40 minutes neither team had scored, but what was yet to come in the third period no one could have guessed.

The Minutemen in the first period were taken to the wood shed in shots as they have been all season long, but in the second the Minutemen created some opportunities of their own.

UMass began the period with a quick break off the face– off by Nathan Sell who broke–in down the center, but Allen was up to the task to keep the game scoreless. With 12:58 UMass freshman defenseman Randy Drohan intercepted a pass and walked in alone and beat Allen, but when he tried to tuck the puck into the wide open net, the rolling puck rolled wide. The score remained 0–0 through two periods.

The third period was the opposite of the first two periods. The first two periods of the game contained no scoring, low shot totals and almost no penalty calls.

The third period began with the referee crucifying the Minutemen. UMass was hit with a charging call on Jeff Blanchard 15 seconds in to the period. Nick Stephens was hit with a penalty with 17:47, which gave Vermont a five on three for two seconds. And one minute later Dean Stork of UMass was hit with a penalty and then two matching minors were assessed. This barrage of penalties was held off by UMass for the first 3:45 before senior Matt Sanders of Vermont notched the first score of the game, giving UVM a 1–0 lead.

The penalties continued, since Mike Dorian, the official, felt bad about the two five on threes he had called, he gave UMass a opportunity on the five on three for 20 seconds. Unfortunately for UMass they have not scored in their last 30 power play attempts.

But the Minutemen would finally break through via the hardest working UMass line of the night. With 12:42 remaining, freshman Martin Miljko dug along the boards and worked the puck to Ray Geever behind the net who found Jeff Turner sitting in the slot. He buried a wrist shot past Allen and tied the game at one. The goal was Turner's second of the season.

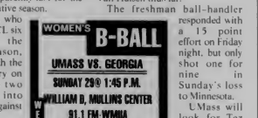
Just a little over three minutes later, and just as Bryan Fitzgerald was leaving the UMass penalty box, Vermont senior forward Pincher was allowed to come around the net and shove a goal short side on Helanen, to regain Vermont a one goal lead, 2–1.

The last major opportunity for the Minutemen to find the back of the net occurred with only 6:46 remaining in the game. Geever created another great opportunity when he took a shot and then collected the rebound — and had apparently beaten everybody and scored, but Vermont veteran Jason Reed covered a sure goal in the crease, which called for a UMass penalty shot.

The Minutemen selected Blanchard, who had a six–game point streak, but this time when he broke in on Allen and went five hole, Allen's skate was able to catch the puck on the way in and redirect towards the post where it stopped.

The Minutemen would not be able to put together one more solid chance and would drop the first of a four game road swing, 2–1 to Vermont. UMass next faces top 10 opponent Colorado College.

Bulldogs trouble for UM



By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

While it may be too early into the season to label this a crisis situation, the Massachusetts women's basketball team may at least be in a state of deep panic.

The Hawaiian excursion over the past weekend proved to be disastrous on all fronts for the Minutewomen (1–4).

The UMass cagers lost all three contests they competed in, but more consequently, Kelly Van Huisen was apparently lost for the second consecutive season.

Van Huisen, who tore her left ACL six games into the 1997–98 season, went down with the identical injury on her left knee two minutes into Friday's loss against Kansas.

While medical word is being awaited on Van Huisen to confirm her status, Jaywana Bradley will also be looked into as she too injured her left knee on Friday night.

In all likelihood, UMass will be down to nine roster players for the foreseeable future, with Bradley possibly returning in a few weeks.

The losses of these two players is particularly unfortunate, because both players missed virtually the entire '97–'98 campaign, and because the duo was considered an integral portion of the offense.

The injuries may have symbolized the worst nightmare of Massachusetts Coach Joanie O'Brien and her players, but they will have to regroup and prepare for the long haul ahead.

The process ought to be quick, because No. 7 Georgia will invade the Mullins Center on Sunday afternoon. That will put the Minutewomen to the ultimate test of ability and fortitude at this early fork in the road.

The Bulldogs (1–0) romped Oral Roberts 118–64 in their initial contest, and will take on Dartmouth tonight, before making the trip to Amherst this weekend.

Georgia, a perennial power, was paced by Miller in the opener, as she posted 26 points to go along with six assists. Miller is one of the five returning starters from last year's 17–11 squad.

Freshman Tawna McDonald was expected to step into the starting five this season, but she will be out indefinitely with a sprained collateral ligament in her right knee.

On the UMass side, Tonia Thomas had been inserted by O'Brien into the lineup to replace Van Huisen thus far.

The freshman ball–handler responded with a 15 point effort on Friday night, but only shot one for nine in Sunday's loss to Minnesota.

UMass will look for Tez Kraft and Allison MacFarland to step up in the absence of Van Huisen and Bradley, as they did last season en route to an NCAA appearance.

The initial response was not good in Hawaii, as they shot a combined 4 for 23 on Sunday for 13 points.

One encouraging factor over the weekend, was improved post play from Yolanda Rayside and Caroline Nehls.

Rayside has stepped up in the rebounding department, averaging 8.5 per contest thus far, while Nehls, a freshman tallied 11 points inside on Minnesota on 4 of 8 shooting from the field.

O'Brien will undoubtedly look for continued production from the players in the middle, but some adept outside shooting will be needed to compliment the post play, especially against high–caliber teams like Georgia.

"We don't want to become primarily a jump–shooting team," O'Brien said. "We won't win many games like that, we need to move the ball inside, and hit the open shots when we have them."

Lady pucksters defeat UConn

By Melissa Sherman

This past weekend proved to be a success for the Massachusetts women's ice hockey team as they added two more victories to their record.

On Saturday the Minutewomen defeated the Holy Cross Crusaders at the William D. Mullins Center practice rink in a 3–2 victory.

"We beat them 8–0 in the beginning of the season, but this time around they came out ready to play, so we were a little lazy but we pulled it together and won with Molly Sherman clutching the winning goal for the women in the third period," UMass coach Scott Martinez said.

Monday night the squad traveled to Connecticut to play the UConn Huskies where they continued their streak. The team slaughtered the Huskies in a 12–0 win.

"Last year the Huskies played really tough. This season they lost a lot of their key players. However, we still had better talent across the board; defense, offense and goal tending," Martinez said of the women's shut–out against UConn.

The Minutewomen were led by center Michelle Kehyaian and Kelly Christie. Both had two goals and two assists against the Huskies.

"Kehyaian has done very well defensively and that's why she is good. As for Christie, she is good on defense and can score [and is] an all around player. Both women are vital to the club," Martinez said.

Netminder Erin Murphy has become a key player to the club's success this season with four shut–outs in six games.

"She has been playing very well for us," Martinez said.

Fortunately for the women they have two goal–keepers they can rely on. Second–year goalie Mindy Corr has also been a big contributor.

Leading the team in goals this season is forward Kathy Mirealult with 11 goals, 2 assists and 13 points, with co–captain Jenna Nolan not far behind leading in points 10–4–14 and setting the season record at 24.

Martinez says the team is coming together well. A lot of the players from last season have improved a lot and have become solid contributors. In addition to the old, rookie Sue Hornung has come aboard and made her mark early in the season proving her talent.

"We are a really good team, but we need to work on beating the really tough teams. The women need to work on goal scoring. We've had a lot of chances and a lot of shots. Many times it has been really close," Martinez said.

Next week UMass will face off against MIT and Skidmore.

Civil War for men's gym

By Gary Mendese

"Let's go, HHHHHershey!" This loud cheer from a rather outspoken fan shared the excitement and enthusiasm that filled the Boyden Gymnastics Center last Friday, as the men's gymnastics team competed in its annual intrasquad meet.

It was Minuteman versus Minuteman as Coach Roy Johnson divided his squad into two teams; red and blue. Each was comprised of both freshmen and veterans of last year. The meet is designed to get the men back into competition mode, and to give Johnson a better idea as to who will compete in the UMass open and the rest of the season. Though this may appear to be an easy task, Johnson has a tough job, as many athletes placed at the top.

The blue team, with crushing performances by junior Jeff LaVallee, pulverized the red team with a final score of 211.4 to 205.6. The blue team dominated every aspect as LaVallee remained the only athlete in the meet to score above a 9.0 on every event.

Though the red team lost by a substantial loss of almost 6 points, they were far from passive, as graduate captain Stephen Pryor, senior Dan Young and sophomores Andrew Leis and Bryan McNulty all contributed some of the top scoring outputs of the meet.

The Cowboys entered the season ranked first in the country, but, having suffered close losses to Northwestern St. and Nicholls St., have fallen down to the sixth slot in the nation.

The Minutemen began the year unranked, but rose as far as No. 7 after defeating reputable opponents such as Hofstra, who was ranked fifth at the time, and current No. 3 Richmond; both on the road. UMass now sits at the eleventh seed after a heart–braking loss to Connecticut at home.

UK's royals lose right to sit in Parliament

LONDON (AP) — A centuries–old perk of British royalty will soon go the way of the broadsword and buggy whip.

Like his father, brother and two royal cousins, Prince Charles will lose his right to sit in the House of Lords, under the Labor Party government's planned purge of Britain's unelected upper chamber, Buckingham Palace said yesterday.

Not that anyone will be missing much: Charles has not been to the House of Lords since making a maiden speech there in June 1974. Even then, Charles noted that apart from his mother, Queen Elizabeth II — who opens each annual session of Parliament — about 100 years had passed since a member of the royal family had gone to the all–male chamber.

A bill to be introduced soon would strip 759 aristocrats with inherited titles of their 600–year–old right to vote in the upper chamber. The aristocrats currently share the House of Lords with some 500 peers holding lifetime titles.

New gun law takes effect today

WASHINGTON (AP) — The rush of holiday shopping and the opening of winter hunting season could find gun buyers facing new obstacles starting tomorrow, the first day of operation for a new national system of instant background checks.

The system, operated by the FBI and state governments, replaces the voluntary checks on handgun buyers conducted by state and local police and sheriffs that has been in place since 1993.

The Justice Department had long planned to set the system up and running on Nov. 30, the date set by the 1993 Brady Act, which established federal background checks for handgun purchases. But authorities said they expected some difficulties as they break in a new routine.

Under the new system, the number of checks performed will double because a new law requires background approvals not just for handgun buyers but also those who buy long guns and shotguns. An estimated 12.4 million firearms of all kinds are sold each year in the United States. All will be covered now, plus another 2.5 million annual transactions — when an owner retrieves a firearm from a pawn shop.

Two UM students sentenced for brutal beating last April

By Lorraine Kennedy
Collegian Staff

Two University of Massachusetts seniors were ordered to spend Thanksgiving in jail for their involvement in the brutal beating of a fellow student last April.

Justin Carney and Jonathan Hanna, both 21, pleaded guilty on Wednesday in Hampshire District Court in Northampton for the beating of Kyle Shonak outside of Pruddy's Restaurant in Amherst on April 3. Another UMass student and former UMass soccer player, Robert Cairo, is serving a three–month prison sentence for his part in the incident.

District Court Judge W. Michael Ryan sentenced Carney and Hanna to a one–year suspended jail sentence with six days to be spent immediately at the Hampshire County House of Corrections.

"It's appropriate that they spend this Thanksgiving incarcerated," the judge said.

Among the conditions of their sentence, the judge ordered that the two men do 100 hours of community service, participate in alcohol counseling and pay $1000 restitution to the victim.

During the hearing, Ryan had the defendants take turns reading aloud statements written by members of the victim's family.

"It looked like he had been stomped on by a herd of horses," Shonak's father said in his statement, of his son's appearance after the beating. "I recognized it was really Kyle by his ears."

In Shonak's mother's statement, she said her son lost five teeth as a result of the beating. Because the bone was "pulverized," she said, the teeth could not be refastened.

Carney read aloud Shonak's statement to the court.

"They injured me more emotionally," Shonak said in his statement, adding that he may suffer from post–traumatic distress. "I feel very vulnerable and scared."

Assistant Northwestern District Attorney David Ross said that Shonak and a friend were leaving Pruddy's the night of the incident when Shonak was pushed by Carney and fell unconscious after hitting his head against a railing. The prosecutor said the defendants beat Shonak while he was unconscious, then fled the scene. Ross said the beating was in retaliation for a past incident in which Shonak hit a member of the UMass soccer team with a bottle and injured him.

"We don't ask for a conviction every time a student in a bar gets involved in a tussle," he said. But because of the seriousness of the injuries Shonak suffered, he said, a conviction would send a "strong message."

"Neither youthfulness nor intoxication, nor anger and vigilantism will be tolerated in Hampshire County," Ross told the court.

A lawyer for Hanna noted that Hanna had no past record of violence and that the incident was an "aberration of behavior."

"He's not an aggressive or violent person," he said of Hanna, a former UMass soccer player. "He allowed his loyalty to his friends to subvert his own moral values."

Hanna read a personal statement to the court and apologized directly to the victim's family, who was seated in the courtroom.

"I cannot rid myself of the horrible feelings of remorse and shame," he said. "I believe I have learned a vital lesson — Think before you act."

A lawyer for Carney said Carney "made a misjudgment" that night at Pruddy's and is a "good candidate for probation."

"Not a day goes by in my life when I don't regret what I've done... I sincerely mean I'm sorry," he said directly to Shonak's family, his voice cracking with emotion.

Before handing down the sentence, the judge asked Hanna directly, "Do you think your apology makes up for the pain?" to which he replied, "No."

Student dies after being hit by car

University of Massachusetts student Kerry Hines, 25, 81 Presidential Apartments, Amherst, died Friday due to injuries sustained after being hit by a car Nov. 11.

Hines, a Randolph native, was a senior Biology major at the University.

Funeral information was not available at press–time.

Hines had been in critical condition at Baystate Medical Center since being struck by a car in front of Hills House earlier this month.

According to police in an earlier Collegian article, Hines was crossing in front of Hills House when she was struck by Appollos Ihedigbo, 52, a University employee, driving south on Infirmary Way. There is no crosswalk in front of Hills House.

Police are continuing their investigation of the incident.

Academic journals limited

Budget constraints force library into difficult decisions

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

Margo Crist, Director of Libraries, and Julie Brigham–Grette, Chair of the Research Library Council, presented a report to the Faculty Senate on Nov. 19. The report stated that the maintenance of current journal subscriptions requires at least a five to ten percent annual budget increase. Such an increase is not available; as a result, some journal subscriptions will have to be cancelled.

The question is, which ones? Comparative Literature Professor Maria Tymoczko raised this question at the meeting. She also asked, "What do we do for new fields?"

She cited the example of translation, a relatively new field in comparative literature, in which two new journals have been introduced. One of the journals costs less than fifty dollars, a nominal fee compared to the Journal of Monetary Economics, which costs the library $860 in subscription fees. However, because of the current budget restraints and subsequent freeze on new subscriptions, a subscription to the new journal cannot be purchased.

"It's not a happy decision," Crist said in response to Tymoczko's concern. "[In order to accommodate new journals,] we have to ask faculty what they're willing to drop."

Many faculty members are unwilling to drop publications in their field. Professor Alvin P. Cohen, Chairman of the Asian Languages and Literature department, has submitted a petition to officials at the W.E.B. DuBois Library requesting that they continue supplying The Bibliography of Asian Studies.

The publication is the index to hundreds of journals in the field. Until now, it has been published as a book costing approximately $50. According to Cohen, the publisher has recently announced that the journal will be published as a CD–ROM at a cost of $800–900 per year — a cost the library is hesitant to pay.

"The library is thinking, 'Hardly anyone is interested in this Asian stuff.' I am trying to lobby them [so that] they recognize that it [the bibliography] is something they ought to invest in," Cohen said.

Chancellor David K. Scott, who attended the Nov. 19 meeting, also responded to the report. He challenged faculty to examine their own journal submissions to determine whether or not they were essential contributions to advancements of knowledge in their fields. "What we have is an information explosion, not a scholarly explosion," he said. "It's too high a price to pay to have two–thirds of the publications polluting [the field] for an occasional kernel [of scholarly genius]."

Censure an option for Clinton; some still favor impeachment

By Jim Abrams
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton must state clearly that he lied in the Monica Lewinsky affair before the House Judiciary Committee can consider any alternative to impeachment, Republican members said yesterday. But other lawmakers warned not to ignore momentum for the lesser action of censuring the president. One Republican who has come out against impeachment, Rep. Peter King of New York, predicted that a vote to impeach would fall short in the House, and pursuing that course could perpetuate the image that Republicans put the scandal ahead of the nation's legislative needs.

"It's going to make it harder to get our agenda across. We have to show that we can lead; that we can bring an end to this," he said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

But the move to censure was complicated last week by GOP dissatisfaction with what they said were Clinton's evasive answers to 81 questions on the affair presented to him by Judiciary Committee Chairman Henry Hyde, R–Ill.

"This censure idea without an admission on the President's part is a political cop–out," committee member Rep. Lindsey Graham, R–S.C., told NBC. "I do not want to have an unrepentant perjurer leading the nation into the 21st century."

Clinton has a chance to directly confront the committee on Dec. 8, which is the date when he or his representatives have been invited to testify. White House spokesman Jim Kennedy said the White House is still evaluating how to respond to the invitation. Already, he said, "We've made a good faith effort to respond to the questions, despite the fact that they were designed more for a partisan purpose than a constitutional one."

One Senate Republican, Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, said Clinton should appear in person to defend himself. "I think he ought to have to answer questions and be subject to examination because the answers that he gave were evasive," he said on "Fox News Sunday." "Let's bring the President in."

After questioning Clinton, the committee would decide whether to recommend articles of impeachment to the full House, which could take up most of the following week.

If 218 House members vote to impeach, action would move to the Senate where a two–thirds majority is needed to convict and remove the President from office. With opinions split down party lines, there is little chance of that happening.

Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, one of the first Democrats to openly condemn Clinton's behavior, wrote in the New York Times Sunday that with impeachment unlikely, Congress must censure the President. "Congress needs "a strong statement that makes clear to ourselves and posterity that we are a nation that understands the difference between right and wrong, truth and falsehood." The first House Democrat to urge Clinton to resign over the affair, Rep. Paul McHale of Pennsylvania, said on NBC that while the President's alleged offenses may be impeachable, it would be "profoundly unwise" for the House to impeach him on a party–line vote "against the manifest will of the American people." McHale agreed with Republicans that approval of a censure resolution could depend on Clinton being more forthright. "We can honorably conclude this matter," he said, "if the President were to show some true candor and genuine remorse."

Death row inmate hiding in woods after escape

By Terri Langford
Associated Press

HUNTSVILLE, Texas — Authorities scoured snake-infested woods and creekbeds yesterday for an escaped death row inmate, confident that he was still on prison property and getting hungrier by the hour.

Since Martin E. Gurule dodged prison guards' assault rifle fire and scaled two razor-crowned fences Friday, helicopters, trucks and dogs have been used to comb more than 17,000 swampy and wooded state-owned acres surrounding the prison.

Texas Department of Criminal Justice officials were certain that three days without food will force him to move from his hiding place.

"He just passed 48 hours," department spokesman Glen Castlebury said. "If he's laying down, he's not doing a great deal of movement, exertion, so he is conserving his strength. For an able-bodied man, 48 hours without food, you are coming up on the time you will expect him to start moving."

Gurule, 29, was sentenced to death for shooting Minas "Mike" Piperis on Oct. 12, 1992, during a robbery at a restaurant Piperis owned with his brother, George. Gurule also was charged with killing restaurant worker Anthony Staton, but that case never went to trial.

Prison officials say Gurule and the six other death row inmates escaped late Thanksgiving evening from a recreation yard by cutting a fence with a hacksaw, which has yet to be recovered. They waited for more than three hours atop the Ellis I Unit's flat-topped roof before making a run for the fences at about 12:15 a.m. Friday. As Gurule hit the second of the two fences circling the prison, a motion detector was set off and tower guards made out the moving bodies in heavy fog and began shooting. No one was hit. The rifle blasts stopped six other death row inmates before they could reach the fences.

On Saturday, a homeowner claimed he fired shots at an intruder who fit the fugitive's description, spurring authorities to shift their search about four miles east of the unit. The search was moved back to the prison grounds after authorities concluded Gurule wasn't there, officials said.

Quebec elections today; possibility of secession

By David Crary
Associated Press

MONTREAL — Showing confidence on the last day of campaigning, Quebec's pro-independence premier toured opposition districts yesterday in hopes his party can increase its majority and build momentum for a new referendum on seceding from Canada.

Lucien Bouchard, favored to return to power in tomorrow's provincial election, urged supporters of his Parti Quebecois to work for a high turnout of separatist voters.

He closed the 33-day campaign with a swing through six districts around Montreal, five of them won narrowly by the anti-separatist Quebec Liberal Party in the last election in 1994.

Liberal leader Jean Charest, who wants Quebec to abandon the threat of secession, insisted he still had a chance of victory. But he has spent the campaign's final days trying to shore up support in Liberal districts rather than venturing into separatist areas. A decisive separatist victory tomorrow could accelerate the push for a referendum on secession, while a narrow win might prompt a more cautious approach. A surprise loss to Charest would derail the separatist cause for years.

Twice before, separatists have been defeated in secession referendums, by a big margin in 1980 and narrowly in 1995. Bouchard, not wanting a third defeat, says he would call for another referendum only if convinced the separatists would win. In the meantime, he says he would press for more autonomy for all 10 provinces.

He expressed hope that the widespread anti-separatist animosity in the rest of Canada would subside after the election, even if his party won.

Racist acts add to controversy

ITHACA, N.Y. (AP) — Carla Gibbs says Cornell University was the obvious school of choice for her because of its reputation for being liberal and progressive.

After completing nearly a full semester there, Gibbs now isn't so sure. "I was under the impression that educated people weren't racists," she explains.

Over the past four weeks, a series of racial and ethnic incidents has clouded the campus and forced the administration to increase security.

Students living in a residence primarily for African Americans — called Ujamaa — have received threatening telephone calls laced with racial slurs. Black students, the anonymous caller said, "should get off campus."

A black residence hall supervisor has received threatening messages on his answering machine that included references to the Ku Klux Klan.

Cornell President Hunter Rawlings says other incidents of racial tension on campus have been more subtle. A cartoon printed by the student newspaper, The Cornell Review, depicted a house owned by the Native American student program as a gambling casino.

The Review defended the cartoon as a parody, but Rawlings said it "reflects the group stereotyping that all of us deplore." "These incidents, and others like them, are totally intolerable," Rawlings said in Saturday's editions of the Syracuse Newspapers. "This is not the first time we have experienced such incidents on this campus ... but we will speak out in the face of those who would seek to divide this community rather than bring it together."

No arrests have been made since the threatening calls, but the University has increased campus security. Harold Craft Jr., vice president for campus services, said lighting also has been improved around Ujamaa and Akwekon, the Native American center.

But some students and faculty say the University itself fosters racial tension with some of its new school policies, such as the administration's decision that within five years all freshmen will be housed together.

School officials say the policy will bolster class identity and improve student retention. Critics said it would hurt Ujamaa, Akwekon and the Latino Living Center, and limit housing options for minority students.

"Knowing that I could live in a place like Ujamaa was important to me," Gibbs said. "I wanted as many people like me around me as possible. I knew I'd have plenty of adjusting to do no matter where I lived. I wanted to feel at home."

The University also issued a report this semester which, in part, recommended that Cornell's ethnic study programs — including Latino, Native American, Asian and African American studies — be housed in the same building and work more closely together. Advocates said the move would give ethnic studies a greater collective voice. However, many people in those programs saw it as a means to limit their autonomy and presence.

The recommendations created a debate on campus and resulted in a three-day sit-in at the College of Arts by students. Last week, the University gave in and removed the recommendations from the report. English Professor Scott McMillin told administrators at a forum last Monday that they treat ethnic studies and minority dormitories as "problems to be solved rather than accomplishments to be celebrated in the history of Cornell University."

Others see the link between the report and the harassment as tenuous, even dangerous.

"Racial identity politics have prevented us from engaging in civilized discourse on political, academic and social issues affecting this campus and the world," said Joe Sabia, a graduate student and adviser to The Review.

SEATTLE — The hunched-over man at the bus stop made Chad Reilly nervous. He ripped away the paper bag that cradled his liquor with a flourish, looking Reilly in the eye as he approached. "He was talking to himself, obviously kind of out of it," said Reilly, who decided not to linger and made his way to another bus stop.

Reilly's description of the man matches that of Steven Gary Coole, considered a possible suspect in the shooting death of a city bus driver Friday. The bus, carrying 35 people, fell 50 feet off a bridge.

Three people — including the gunman — died, and 32 people were injured. Seventeen remained hospitalized yesterday, with one man in critical condition. Reilly, who got on the bus at a later stop, came out of the crash with only minor cuts and bruises.

Police would not confirm that Coole shot the driver. Ballistics results, expected today, could identify the gun that shot driver Mark McLaughlin, 44, who died of several gunshot wounds to the abdomen, police spokeswoman Christie-Lynne Bonner said.

Police said the possible gunman was found near the bus with an apparent self-inflicted gunshot wound to the head and a fired gun nearby. A second handgun — unfired — was recovered from the dead passenger's body at Harborview Medical Center, where he was pronounced dead Friday.

The third victim, passenger Herman Liebelt, 69, died Saturday of head injuries and a pelvic fracture.

Coole, who reportedly used the alias Silas Cool, is believed to be from North Plainfield, N.J., 25 miles west of New York City. A man who answered the telephone of D.R. Cool, believed to be the New Jersey residence of Coole's family, refused to comment.

In Seattle, two portraits of the man believed to be Coole emerged. One was of a man seeking redemption in a crowded homeless shelter; the other was Reilly's description of an angry, alcohol-swigging man waiting for a bus.

Bill Wippel of Seattle's Union Gospel Mission said he identified Coole for detectives from a photograph. Wippel said the man had come to the mission twice in the last month, seeking food, shelter and prayer. Coole had asked to be placed on a waiting list for a bed in the downtown mission, but he never received one, Wippel said.

Mouseketeer awaits trial; Child–star accused of stock fraud

By Dennis Anderson
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — TV fans first got to know Darlene Gillespie as a freckle-faced Mouseketeer, described by Disney publicity as having "more bounce to the ounce than a bottle of a soda pop." She was one of the nine original Mouseketeers who appeared in the first season of the "Mickey Mouse Club" and stayed for the duration of the show's 1955-1959 run.

Now the 56-year-old Gillespie is back in the public eye, with jury selection beginning today for her trial on stock fraud charges. Her fiancee has pleaded guilty in the case and been sentenced to prison.

Ms. Gillespie is hardly the first former child star to run into problems in adulthood.

In recent years, Todd Bridges, child star of the "Diff'rent Strokes" TV show, has been arrested several times on charges including assault. He testified in 1989 that he became depressed and turned to drugs after his show was canceled.

Child actor's advocate Paul Petersen, 52, who had the briefest of tenures as a Mouseketeer, has made a career of calling attention to the travails of young performers.

"Part of the deal that's never explained to child performers and stage parents is that 40 years down the road, you are going to be defined by something you did when you were 14 years old," said Petersen, who went on to play the role of Jeff Stone for eight years on "The Donna Reed Show."

During her first season as a Mouseketeer, Gillespie was featured in her own serial, "Corky and White Shadow," about the Wild West adventures of a girl and her heroic dog.

In George Woolery's book, "Children's Television: The First Thirty-Five Years," Gillespie characterized the serial as "horrendous." But she was more ambivalent in "The Official Mickey Mouse Club Book," by Disney executive Lorraine Santoli. "When the show was syndicated on television, I never told my children that the pig-tailed girl named Darlene was their mom," Santoli quotes Gillespie as saying. "I thought perhaps it would embarrass them or that they would think the show silly." However, she also recounted that her children "liked the show and were very proud of me and that made it all worthwhile." Mouseketeer Bobby Burgess said Gillespie was a delight as a person and a performer.

"Darlene was so talented, so nice," said Burgess, 56, who made a smooth transition from Mouseketeer to dance star on "The Lawrence Welk Show."

Burgess, who still makes appearances for Disney and performs with the Welk troupe in Branson, Mo., recalled that in addition to her post-Mouseketeer career as a registered nurse, Gillespie made several attempts to continue in entertainment.

"In Nashville, she tried to get into country-western as Darlene Valentine," Burgess recalled. "She had the talent. Maybe she didn't have the right agent."

As original Mouseketeer Lonnie Burr observed, "Mouse Club" status is the most significant biographical information for child performers who made the show an emblem of 1950s America.

"Whether I scale the Matterhorn or win a Pulitzer, I shall always be known as a Mouseketeer," Burr once wrote.

Gillespie and her fiancee, Jerry Fraschilla, were charged in a complex stock fraud scheme that involved "free riding," or the purchase of stock without paying for it, and obstruction of justice.

Fraschilla, 61, pleaded guilty to 21 federal charges and last month was sentenced to 18 months in prison, plus probation. Gillespie faces 14 counts, including conspiracy, securities fraud and obstruction of justice.

The defense is simple. She was one of the victims rather than one of the perpetrators. We're playing it straight," her lawyer, Charles Rondeau, said last week.

During preliminary court appearances, Gillespie has refused to discuss the case or her childhood career.

"I'd rather not talk about that right now," said Gillespie, her polite smile still recalling the girl who once shone in Mickey Mouse ears.

The case against her stems from a Securities and Exchange Commission investigation that started in March 1993, when Gillespie and Fraschilla were suspected of operating a scheme in which they allegedly tried to make money in stock transactions without paying for the securities.

Give thanks — Hollywood style

Ah, Thanksgiving. What other holiday can boast loads of great grub and pro football games? There's nothing like it — my favorite holiday, really (disregard my Halloween column).

At my house, we had a nice succulent turkey with billowing buttered potatoes and sweet, sweet squash. I'm salivating just thinking about it. The family sat around the table and briefly thanked CBS for blessing our television with Barry Sanders and then we all went to town on the chow Garfield style.

That's right, the jaw dropped and the paws shoveled. Talking ceased.

I've always wondered if the celebrities do Turkey Day like my family does, though. Is Jay Leno sitting there with his wife cutting the bird like my dear old dad, or is he racing around in one of his 870,000 some-odd classic cars?

As usual, I have conjured up a sampling of how public figures probably enjoyed Thanksgiving, and let me tell you, it's nothing like the Koenig household.

Bill Clinton, President of the United States: Let's get Slick Willy out of the way early, because you all knew he was going to be one of my punching bags. Clinton worked up his appetite with some of his famous "pizza surprise," featuring his special sauce. We're not even going to get into misusing the term "stuffing".

What Hillary did all this time, I'm not quite sure. On the bright side, the turkey got pardoned again.

George Lucas, diretor: Lucas assumed that, since the trailer for Episode One: The Phantom Menace caused about 400,000 people to go to the movies, he'd be rolling in cash when the actual flick hit the big screen. Using the force (and a brand new Platinum Visa Card), the legendary director closed his eyes and had four gigantic turkeys levitate into his dining room.

Bob Kraft, owner of the New England Patriots: Kraft bought a huge turkey, which he filled with the best batch of stuffing in the nation. Then, after he was convinced that the stuffing had made the meal the best it could be, he irritated the hell out of the stuffing, and chased it off to New York. The Dolphins and Falcons then ate the meal up and, after having digested, flushed it down the toilet.

Upset that his meal was ripped to shreds by all these brutes, Kraft picked up the battered remains of his meal and took them to Hartford.

Drew Bledsoe, quarterback of the Patriots: Bledsoe, with a broken index finger, takes his bird out of the oven with less than a minute left on the timer for the second straight holiday. His successful cooking of the turkey keeps Kraft's battered remains in the hunt for a fourth straight division title (direct local sports reference — if you don't get it, don't feel too bad).

Seth Koenig

Hanson, rock band: The three young brothers, tired of their up-beat, Jackson Five-ish sort of music, decided to take barbiturates. Well, all accept the youngest bro, who was sent into a violent depression with just skim milk. Hanson's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Hanson, retaliated by telling their famous kids that Santa Claus wasn't real.

The day after Thanksgiving, Hanson announced their release of a death metal album, coming in January.

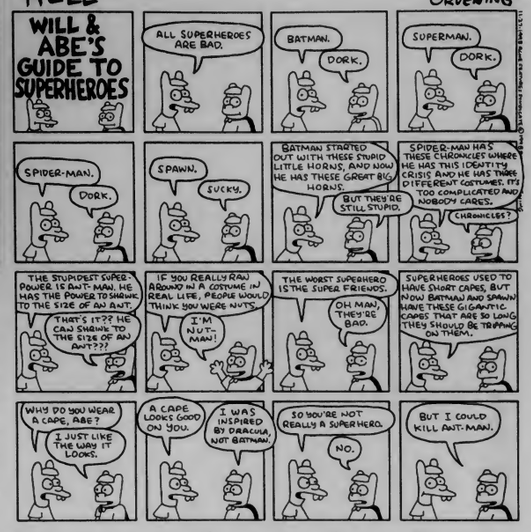
Hulk Hogan, professional wrestler: "Hollywood" Hogan, having followed the lead of former WWF mate Jesse "The Body/Mind" Ventura by declaring politics his new cup of tea, passed up Thanksgiving as he's always known it and traveled to the nation's capital. Angered that his wife and children didn't want to make the trip to crime-infested D.C., the Hulkster clobbered Mrs. Hogan with a steel chair. Then, in an amazing, unprecedented series of events, John "Skullcrusher" Smith raced out of the locker room in defense of the woman and put the heavyweight dad in his patented hold, the "Spine-Twizzler".

Still in allegiance to Hogan, the older son, "The Human Tarantula", then flung salt into the eyes of Smith, freeing Hulk to catch his plane and declare his candidacy for president. A relatively tame holiday for politicians.

Marilyn Manson: Manson spent Thanksgiving dressed up in his best leather and thigh-highs and devoured a dead animal. Otherwise known as "any day of the week", for Mr. Manson.

Jack Kevorkian, suicide-assisting doctor: Claiming that the turkey begged to die before he was gassed, Kevorkian rationalized the death of the main course to his family. What his kindred didn't see, though, were the baby carrots that Dr. Death had hooked up to electric chairs in the other room. The applesauce on the table? You guessed it — straight from the Heaven's Gate cult in California!

John Stamos: Thanked God over and over again that a chump like himself could manage to land Rebecca Romijn.



Dave Coulier: Coulier had nothing to be thankful for, unlike his former "Full House" mate, so he just did Bullwinkle and Popeye impressions all day.

Jennifer Love Hewitt: The star of the recent horror film, I Still Know What You Did Last Summer, gave thanks to her plastic surgeon for her humongous chest and the movie success she's had as a result of it, joining her in that sentiment were thousands of male movie-goers.

Also in the thoughts of the young beauty were the plans for another horror film, I Haven't Forgotten Yet What You Did Two Summers Ago.

Craig, the Koenigs' Turkey: Was eaten.

Lessons from the detox

Junkies are a whole lot easier to handle than drunks.

While I was at UMass Lowell, I worked nights at a public detox. The experience broadened my range of acquaintances.

I conducted personal research in the field of addiction on my own initiative and had been free of alcohol and other mood altering drugs for over nine years when I took the detox job. That, more than the medical training I received in Special Forces, was my most valuable qualification for this kind of work.

My shift began at 11 p.m., when the incoming charge nurse and I would be briefed by the staff going off duty. If any of the patients in the thirty-two bed facility had been a problem for medical or behavioral reasons, we needed to know. There were only two of us on the night shift until 7 a.m.

Many of our patients were frequent guests.

I still didn't have much idea of the sickness I was dealing with the first time I admitted "Joanie," a pretty, nineteen- year-old heroin addict with black hair and big brown eyes, who arrived one night at midnight with her belongings in a shopping bag. I filled out her paperwork and took her vitals. She had MassHealth — all the heroins had MassHealth.

As far as I could see from her records, she had only one previous admit. She was high, of course, but she was cooperative. She cheerfully chatted away about how much progress she had been making in recovery, until some guy had a bundle and offered to share it with her and she didn't know why she did it — she knew it was stupid, and this time she was gonna go to at least two meetings every day and stay clean. She told me she only did three or four bags during her relapse, whereupon she produced a Bible, a copy of Narcotics Anonymous and a teddy bear from her shopping bag.

"Take these pajamas and go..." She started taking her clothes off. "Whoa! Get dressed in the ladies room." To which she replied, "Oh, it's okay," and continued.

"Well hello, Joanie," the charge nurse came in with a big smile. "Nice to see you again." She waltzed Joanie off to the station, checked her out and gave her some meds.

After getting Joanie settled, I sat down at my desk and went through the paperwork for the next admit. "What do you think of Joanie?" The charge nurse asked. I said, "She seems like a nice kid. I hope she makes it."

"Let me tell you about little Joanie. She's in and out of here every month or so. She's been doing fifteen bags a day for the past few weeks. She had two babies before she was eighteen and she had her second abortion five months ago. She's dual axis–schizophrenic — and she's HIV positive, by the way."

Joanie wasn't cheerful the following night. She kept coming to the window whining for meds — valium, anything. She had already gotten her ration. I gave her cigarettes from the supply donated for the patients. After three days she left against medical advice. She must have found another guy with a bundle, because she was back in less than two weeks.

Martin Reddy

Al was an old street guy — an alcoholic. Al arrived courtesy of the police, who actually behaved kindly toward him. "Al's an old friend of ours," the officer said. He was a lot harder to admit. He decried the state of the world and woke up the other patients. When I tried to get his history he wailed, "Why you gotta ask me all the questions?" Neither his breath nor his clothing were of this world. The next evening he sat quietly reading Alcoholics Anonymous.

Jose, 42, spent his whole life, as he said, "Chasing the dope." In addition, he had HIV. I checked his blood pressure, and I thought he was in trouble. I learned that it's not unusual for a career addict to have very low blood pressure. After a few days, he kept himself groomed and participated enthusiastically in treatment. He stayed for three weeks, but after leaving he was back within a month.

Latinos often hallucinated while withdrawing from heroin. One young man responded to points of light reflected from a chandelier by dancing as though he were in a disco.

There is almost no such thing as a recovering heroin addict. The best estimate is that one in thirty–two alcoholics who seek help will remain sober for five years or more. Nobody ever got clean or sober by "battling" alcoholism or addiction. Every winner in recovery admitted defeat and accepted It.

Publicly funded programs, needle exchanges and similar imbecilities are public relations gimmicks that make "earth people" feel good about themselves. Needing recovery means nothing. Wanting it is everything.

Letters to the Editor

To David, thank you

To the editor:
David, who delighted in others,
Could we but wish him here,
We'd tell him all the hundred ways
He's helped us — through the murk — see clear.

He's helped us name, define, and label,
Set things in charts when we were able.
From popular education to participatory whatever,
Bonds to full, inclusive goals where values and discernment
Mattered more than merely being clever.

He modeled humor, grace, good will,
And asking the best of ourselves,
Casting our nets the further.
Seeing how together, It's deeper and stronger we delve.

I think of him as full heart
The essence of wanting to share
The soul of being a teacher
Bringing himself as a person to bear

Challenging us as people, too, not disembodied minds.
Dig deeper, search and re-search
Rooting our presumptions or habits that blind
See what, by asking one more question,
Together we might find.

He let us make up courses.
With readings and projects to fit our needs,
Committed to the search, not the end,
He taught us to build each other's leads.

I hope we do him justice
As in this world we walk
Put our lives and hearts on the line
Cuz it's never been just about talk.

A Very, very bad movie

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

VERY BAD THINGS
Directed by Peter Berg
with Christian Slater, Cameron Diaz, Jon Favreau
Playing at Showcase Cinemas, Springfield

Christian Slater has been doing some very bad things lately. Run-ins with the law have him currently competing with Charlie Sheen for Hollywood's Reckless Idiot Award; because of his problems, he hasn't made a movie in quite a while. His star status in the early 90's — from movies like Pump Up the Volume and the superb True Romance — has now dissolved. All of his antics, however, can't compare to the mistake he makes in starring in Very Bad Things.

As written and directed by the "Chicago Hope" actor Peter Berg, Very Bad Things is one of those movies that would have benefited society better had it not been made. A black comedy it tries to be, but Berg is a hack — and an unfunny one at that.

Slater stars as the leader of a gang of seemingly normal, working–class guys who go to Vegas to celebrate the bachelor party of Kyle Fisher (Jon Favreau). Fisher is a little uptight — his fiancee (Cameron Diaz) keeps nagging him about fixing some chairs for the wedding — so his friends go crazy and get a stripper and a whole pile of drugs.

One thing leads to another, and in a freak accident, the stripper dies. Now, a couple of different tones could be established here — it could be pure screwball comedy or a serio–comic examination of guilt and morality. But Berg seems to want both.

After some early morality struggles, his film explodes into scene after scene of outrageously bizarre behavior. As the guilt for the crime grows, psychotic tendencies are brought out in each of the friends, especially in Slater's character and the nervous stripper–killer (Jeremy Piven). Friends kill friends, friends kill strangers, and the film turns into "Jerry Springer" on acid.

What's so disturbing about the film is not the numerous body decapitations, murderous activites, or just the immoral behavior — but the fact that Berg and company thinks what they're doing is funny. As proven in There's Something About Mary, the work of the Coen brothers, Quentin Tarantino, and "South Park", humor is often best when derived from other people's misfortunes. The key is to find a comic tone that merely uses the material as inspiration. Instead, Berg seems to think that the material is the comedy; his script is witless and boring.

Very Bad Things also manages the feat of transforming the lovely Cameron Diaz into an annoying bride–to–be. Diaz gives it her best shot, and occasionally has some funny things to say, but even she can't lift such drab material.

And that's the main problem with the film — for a comedy, there's a strong lack of interesting characters. We've seen Slater do this act before; Daniel Stern is wasted as an equally annoying dad; Favreau is giving nothing to do but gasp in shock, and Ieanne Tripplehorn, as Stern's wife, looks dead before she even gets killed.

Technically, the film has few flaws. Berg shows he has at least some camera skills. Of course, his quirky angles are ripped off from just about every black comedy ever made. There's even the obligatory Reservoir Dogs shot as the gang exits a hardware store. This would be clever if Swingers hadn't already copied it, too.

On a statistical note, however, Very Bad Things is the 222nd movie where Favreau plays a sensitive guy who goes to Vegas, and the 541st where Diaz is getting married. It's also one of the top 100 worst films of all time.

The western Massachusetts sensation, Mary's First, was also on the bill and is a Snow Show returnee.

Snow Show joins a stellar list of Mullins Center Fall Semester events that include Tori Amos, A Tribe Called Quest, and Korn. Wright comments that the "Mullins Center has been extremely supportive In bringing in entertainment."

The mission of Snow Show, says Wright, is "to provide great rock 'n' roll for a very low price," as tickets are only $9.95. Wright continues that 99.3 Rocks "thought that was a great rock 'n' roll value." With five great bands and tickets at a similar price to those at club show, how could you go wrong?

Tickets are still available for tonight's Snow Show '98. Tickets may be purchased at the Mullins Center Box Office. The first band is scheduled to be on stage at 7 p.m.

Disney's bugs score big in weekend box–office

By Michael Fleeman
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — A Bug's Life broke box office records for Thanksgiving weekend and The Rugrats Movie remained strong against tough competition; but the troubled porker sequel Babe: Pig in the City got walloped, according to estimates yesterday.

It was a banner weekend for Disney, which had three of the top five films — A Bug's Life, Enemy of the State and Waterboy — and about 60 percent of the total box office take for the Top 10.

Overall, the studio reaped more than $92 million over the five-day holiday weekend, making up for such recent financial duds as Beloved and Holy Man.

"You know those Macy's parade balloons? That's how I feel — floating on air," Disney distribution head Phil Barlow said.

In its first weekend of wide release, A Bug's Life, the computer-animated story of an ant colony threatened by greedy grasshoppers, brought in $46.5 million over the Wednesday-through-Sunday weekend. That made it the biggest Thanksgiving movie for Disney, topping the live-action "101 Dalmatians," which had $45.1 million in 1996.

"Bug's" performed better than the studio's last computer-animated film produced in partnership with Pixar, Toy Story, which opened with $39.1 million in 1995. It also topped the debut of this year's other computer-animated ant movie, DreamWorks' Antz, which has grossed $84.3 million. Disney is now firmly established as the Thanksgiving weekend champ, having released the No. 1 film the last five years with A Bug's Life, Flubber, 101 Dalmatians, Toy Story and The Santa Clause.

Disney also scored this weekend with the Will Smith thriller Enemy of the State, which had $25.7 million for third place, and Waterboy, the Adam Sandler comedy, which had $19.9 million for fourth.

Still, Paramount's The Rugrats Movie managed to get a big chunk of the action, grossing $27.6 million for second. Business dropped only about 20 percent in the second week for the big-screen version of the popular Nickelodeon cable cartoon.

The big loser this holiday weekend was Babe: Pig in the City, the sequel to the successful 1995 film about a lovable pig. It opened to just $8.5 million for fifth place.

Here are estimated grosses at North American theaters for Wednesday through yesterday as compiled by Exhibitor Relations Co. Inc. Final figures were to be released today:

1. A Bug's Life, $46.5 million.
2. The Rugrats Movie, $27.6 million.
3. Enemy of the State, $25.7 million.
4. The Waterboy, $19.9 million.
5. Babe: Pig in the City, $8.5 million.
6. Meet Joe Black, $8.1 million.
7. I Still Know What You Did Last Summer, $6.5 million.
8. Ringmaster, $5.3 million.
9. Home Fries, $5.2 million.
10. Very Bad Things, $4.7 million.

Men's Hockey splits a pair on the road

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team took their 3–5–1 record to Colorado College and Air Force this weekend for a pair of non-conference matches.

The Minutemen were attempting to rebound from a heartbreaking 2–1 loss at the hands of Vermont on Tuesday night.

"These are the kinds of games [Colorado College and Air Force], which will tell us where we stand," said UMass coach Joe Mallen after a recent win over Union College.

The Minutemen put forth a solid effort this weekend in splitting their pair of games.

Despite being outshot against No. 2 Colorado College, the Minutemen fell only by a score of 4–2. The Minutemen bounced back last night with a 6–2 drubbing of Air Force.

Against Colorado College (10–2), the Minutemen (4–6–1, 2–2–1 in the Hockey East) ran into an immovable object. The Minutemen were only able to get 18 shots on Colorado College goalie Jeff Sanger, while UMass goalie Markus Helanen had to contend with a tougher task as he faced 37 shots.

The Tigers dominated the first period as they took the play to UMass; their hard worked paid off twice in the form of two goals.

The first goal came on the power play when Brian Swanson fed Ion Austin, who ripped a shot that caught the top of the net at the 6:42 mark of the first period. The Tigers extended their lead to 2-0 at the 8:56 mark of the first, when Jesse Heerema scored the first of his two goals on the night on a feed from Swanson.

The second period provided no scoring for either team. In the third the Minutemen woke up, but it was too little, too late.

At the 13:57 mark of the third period Heerema would find the back of the net again, this time on the power-play to extend the Tigers lead to 3–0.

UMass responded with only 2:37 remaining in regulation, when Ray Geever found himself on a break out — shorthanded– and put the puck past Sanger to break up the shutout.

The Minutemen didn't stop there. With only :41 seconds remaining in regulation, the Minutemen pulled to within a goal of the number two team in the nation when Nathan Sell scored his fourth goal of the season, which was assisted by UMass leading point getter Jeff Blanchard. But the comeback attempt would be put to rest on an empty net goal by Swanson with 26 seconds remaining in the game.

The Minutemen were faced with a two-game losing streak as they headed into their contest with Airforce, but UMass would respond in style. The MInutemen finally broke out of their recent powerplay slump early on. After UMass had jumped out to a 1–0 lead on Blanchard's goal from Bryan Fitzgerald and Sell, they would strike on their first powerplay goal in 35 tries. Geever was the Minuteman who broke the streak and opened the flood gates. He was assisted on a pass from Martin Miljko to give UMass a 2–0 lead after only 3:50 of play in the first.

Air Force would respond to the UMass attack — scoring two first-period goals of their own.

With the score deadlocked at two after one, the Minutemen struck again at the 8:27 mark of the second period, when Kris Wallis berried a pass from freshman defenseman Chris Brannen to give UMass a one goal advantage.

Then lo and behold, UMass scored their second powerplay goal of the game. This one came at the 15:21 mark of the second from Fitzgerald, on assists from Sell and Blanchard.

Sell and Blanchard weren't done. After an early third period goal from Wallis, Sell would tally UMass' third powerplay goal of the game on a sweet set of passes from Blanchard and Fitzgerald. On the strength of these three powerplay, goals the Minutemen handed Air Force a 6–2 beating.

UMass goalie Markus Helanen once again stood out in earning his fourth win of the season — making 27 saves on the 29 shots he faced.

The real story for UMass was the play of Sell and Blanchard this weekend. The juniors had a great trip, tallying several points for the Minutemen. Sell scored two goals and two assists, while Blanchard netted a goal and three assists on the weekend.

The other standouts for the Minutemen included Fitzgerald, who also had a goal and two assists in the Air Force game, and Geever who had a two goals, a shorthanded tally on Friday, and a Powerplay score on Saturday.

The Minutemen return to Hockey East conference competition this Friday and Saturday as they face off in a home and home series against rival Boston University. The Minutemen are looking to this set of games with the Terriers as one the telling points in this young season. The home portion of the series will be Saturday night at the William D. Mullins Center at 7 p.m.

Move not set in stone

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — Another $25 million will be tacked onto the cost of building a Hartford stadium for the New England Patriots, pushing the project price to an estimated $375 million, according to reports.

When Gov. John G. Rowland signed an agreement with Patriots owner Robert Kraft on Nov. 19 to build the stadium, the cost was announced as $350 million.

Now, when the legislature holds a special session on Dec. 15, lawmakers will be asked to approve an additional $25 million to cover the costs of inflation while the stadium is being built, according to legislative briefing papers obtained by The Hartford Courant. Legislative leaders were told by Rowland's negotiators before the governor signed the deal that while the stadium would cost $350 million in present-day dollars, inflation would drive the price higher before the stadium is completed in 2001.

"There's been no effort to hide anything here," said Dean Pagani, Rowland's press secretary.

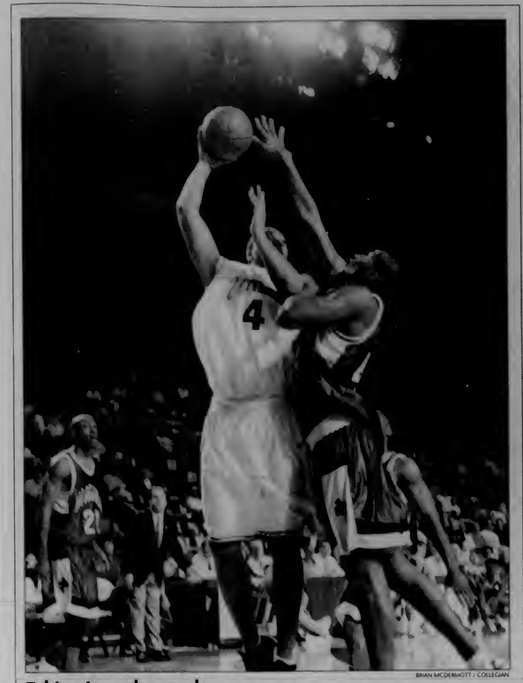
Senate President Pro Tem Kevin B. Sullivan, D-West Hartford, confirmed that legislative leaders were given the higher number, and said lawmakers are comfortable with the reasons for it. "We've communicated to our folks that $375 million is the probable completion number," said Sullivan. "Who knows? It could be $360 million; it could be 4 [hundred million dollars]. Like any construction project, it's difficult to guarantee it would come in on the money."

Sullivan said that, in retrospect, it might have been better to give a cost range including inflation on Nov. 19.

State officials say that even with the inflationary increase, the stadium's $375 million cost still would be covered by admission taxes, sales taxes and income taxes collected as a result of the Patriots' move to Connecticut.

In short, they argue, the cost would be paid by fans attending Patriots games — not by taxpayers who never go to the stadium. The briefing papers show how the Rowland administration and lawmakers will try to sell the project on the promise of jobs and a rent-free stadium for the University of Connecticut football program.

Building the stadium would create 4,600 full-time jobs during construction, according to a preliminary study done by KPMG Peat Marwick. Operation of the stadium — including moving the Patriots' offices to Connecticut — is expected to create 2,700 permanent jobs.



Meanwhile, the region's top environmental regulator downplayed concerns that soil contamination at the proposed stadium site could hinder the project.

Part of the site used to be a coal gassification plant that produced potentially dangerous pollutants.

"These environmental issues are eminently resolvable and they don't threaten the viability of the Adriaen's Landing redevelopment proposal," John DeVillars, regional administrator of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, told The Boston Globe. "They are challenging and they are going to require a lot of effort, but they are resolvable."

NBA sets January as deadline; Patriots and Packers get big wins

By Chris Sheridon
Associated Press

NEW YORK — It's called the January Theory, and it holds that the NBA lockout will last at least another five weeks. "It could be that they don't meet for another month," agent Steve Kauffman said yesterday. "I've been telling my players for the past couple of weeks that they shouldn't expect to play until mid-January at the earliest."

With negotiations stalled and the players believing the owners are trying to further test their resolve, it appears that commissioner David Stern is following a lockout calendar similar to the one employed by NHL commissioner Gary Bettman during the 1994-95 lockout, which wasn't settled until Jan. 13.

The hockey lockout included a period from Dec. 6-Jan. 7 in which no talks were held. The sides then made "final" offers and "final-final" offers before a marathon negotiating session settled it.

It would take another three weeks of lockout limbo to match that month-long lull. So far, the sides in the NBA dispute have gone 10 days since their last full bargaining session, and that 9 1/2-hour meeting was the only one the sides had in November.

Currently, the owners and players are at odds over whether there will be preconditions for a resumption.

About 120 players participated in a conference call Saturday and were brought up to date on the stalemate, a union spokesman said. Today will mark the second missed payday for the players, and a new month will begin tomorrow with the outlook bleak. Millions of dollars have been lost, the fans are upset, and the long-term damage could be worse than expected.

Stern and deputy commissioner Russ Granik have staunchly refused to set a "drop dead" date for saving the season, although they have alluded to mid-December being the ballpark date.

That vague deadline could be extended, however, if Stern backs off his insistence upon having the deal put on paper and ratified — a process that could take 2-3 weeks — before the lockout would be lifted.

"If they back off that 2-3 weeks, it's a different story. Then the January theory makes a lot of sense," said Kauffman, who represents 19 players. "And remember, we can go from a doomsday scenario to a settlement in a matter of 2-3 days."

Stern and Granik have said four weeks would be needed from the time a deal was reached until the season could begin, but in reality that window could be shrunk to three weeks — and maybe as few as 18-20 days — to allow for free agent signings, trades and training camps to take place.

So if an agreement were reached Jan. 4, for instance, and the signing-training camp period was shrunk to 20 days, the season would begin Sunday, Jan. 24 — one week before the Super Bowl and one week after NBC was scheduled to begin its weekly telecasts. Each team would then be able to play a 46- or 48-game season, but only if two weeks were added on to the end of the regular season in April.

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) — For the second time in seven days, Drew Bledsoe flipped the winning touchdown pass with a fractured finger and kept the Patriots in the thick of the playoff race.

With no time, but one play left after a defensive pass interference call in the end zone against Henry Jones, Bledsoe threw a 1-yard pass to Ben Coates, and New England beat the Buffalo Bills 25-21 yesterday.

The win moved the Patriots (7-5) into a tie with the Bills, one game behind the New York Jets and Miami in the AFC East, as Buffalo lost for just the second time in nine games. Bledsoe ruined Doug Flutie's homecoming in a stadium where he had been 10-0.

Dolphins 30, Saints 10. Dan Marino threw three touchdown passes to O.J. McDuffie, becoming the first player in NFL history to reach 400 career TD passes, as the Dolphins (8-4) stayed in a tie with the Jets in the AFC East by overcoming an early 10-3 lead by the Saints (5-7). Marino hit McDuffie with a 22-yard scoring pass late in the second quarter, then reached the milestone by hitting McDuffie with a 4-yard TD toss on the first play of the fourth quarter. They hooked up again on a 9-yard TD pass with 7:34 left to cap the scoring.

Massachusetts victorious in Div. I–AA football playoffs against McNeese St. behind play of frosh

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

LAKE CHARLES, LA — With 1:42 to go in the game, McNeese St. kicker Shonz LaFrenz trotted onto the field for the final time this season.

LaFrenz, already responsible for 13 of the Cowboys' 19 points against Massachusetts in the opening round of the NCAA Division I-AA playoffs, was now facing his biggest challenge yet: a 52 yarder to bridge the two-point gap between McNeese St. and the visiting Minutemen.

Against perhaps any other kicker, UMass Coach Mark Whipple might have begun planning for the next week's second round matchup with Lehigh in Amherst, but LaFrenz was different.

As the ball left the junior placekicker's foot, it was launched far and deep towards the uprights into a slight breeze. Unfortunately for the Cowboys, though, LaFrenz sacrificed a hair of accuracy for distance, and the ball sailed just wide of the right goal post, securing a 21–19 victory for the Minutemen.

That play was the end of a relentless second-half comeback on the part of McNeese St., tallying 19 unanswered points to nearly upend UMass.

Working without All–America candidate Marcel Shipp in the backfield, where the sophomore has provided nine consecutive 100–yard games, the Minuteman offense stalled often in the final two periods, despite a prolific second quarter during which they scored 21 points.

BRIAN MCGERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Kerry Taylor caught seven passes for 119 yards and one touchdown in UMass' win over McNeese St. in the first round of the Division I–AA playoffs Saturday.

"You have to credit McNeese's defense," Whipple said. "We couldn't get the last nail in the coffin. We tried to get the ball over the top a couple times; we thought we had a couple things, but we just couldn't do it."

Cowboy quarterback Blake Prejean, who entered halftime with only seven completions for 71 yards, played well when forced to pass in the second half, recording 215 yards and a touchdown on 21 completions at the end of the game.

Prejean's receivers, however, couldn't seem to execute under the added pressure, dropping key passes that would've easily propelled McNeese St. into the second round.

With what was probably the most obvious of the follies, Cowboy split–end William Davis, who had a statistically sound eight receptions for 94 yards and a score, let a deep spiral bounce out of his hands as he sprinted past the UMass secondary untouched towards the end zone with just over two minutes remaining in the game.

Conversely, when the Minutemen needed clutch performances, they got them. With Shipp out of the game due to bursitis in his knee, freshman Kevin Quinlan carried the load, taking the pigskin from quarterback Todd Bankhead 28 times, and racking up 147 yards and a touchdown.

"It was scary at first, and it's tough on Marcel, especially after the season he's had," Quinlan said. "I just had to calm down before the game and do the best I could and just forget about the crowd and play."

Classmate Adrian Zullo, the 1998 Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year, was not supposed to play in the contest because of a knee injury suffered just one week ago against Connecticut in the final game of the regular season.

"The doc' said he wouldn't play for three weeks. Then I was trying to put together a game plan without Marcel and without Adrian," Whipple said.

"He told me yesterday, 'I'm going to make a couple plays. So I said [to him], 'We're going to try to keep you out of the run stuff and try to get you over the top one or two times to try and stretch their fast secondary.' He came up big ... He's just one of the many guys here that are tremendous competitors: that love playing football."

Zullo put the second UMass touchdown on the scoreboard with a 31–yard reception with 10:36 to go before the half, roughly two minutes after Quinlan's two–yard plunge began the evening's scoring. Senior tight end Kerry Taylor finished off the Massachusetts point production with a seven–yard touchdown catch from Bankhead five minutes later.

Taylor had perhaps the biggest game of all, leading the offense with seven catches for 119 yards and a score. Taylor seemed to spend the game making big plays, as a hard–nosed run after a catch provided the Minutemen with a key conversion on third and 21, with 4:25 left in the third frame.

The only time the hosting Cowboys saw their own end zone was with 9:33 to go in the matchup, when Davis got positioning on UMass defender Lance Overby and pulled in a 10–yard pass from Prejean. That catch completed a short, 39–yard drive that took a tedious nine plays.

Overby redeemed himself with a superb performance on the day, however, tallying an interception and a sack.

Overall the handicapped Minutemen just played harder.

"They played their hearts out," Whipple said. "We talked to the defense a little bit, [and we told them] that they were going to have to step it up, as yesterday we knew Marcel wasn't going to be able to go. Everybody else was going to have to pick it up without him."

UM hangs on over MSU

Time and missed FG save UM from losing opener

Matt Dawson and the Minutemen defense held McNeese St. to 19 points in their two-point win in the first round of the playoffs.

LAKE CHARLES, LA — 21–0. Nice.

21–3. Still a large advantage.

21–6. A two–possession game, but still comfy.

21–9. Hanging tough. They can't score the big one.

21–16. Um, guys...

21–19. Calling all cars, calling all cars. Red alert.

Remember how the hare fell asleep and relinquished a huge lead to his arch rival the tortoise?

The Bayou Classic, or the first round of the Division I–AA playoffs saw more of the same, except, this time around, the tortoise tripped and knocked the sleeping lad over, allowing the bunny to win by an ear.

On Saturday night, it could have been relaxation, or it could have been a McNeese State resurgence, but in getting their first playoff victory since 1978, the Massachusetts football team kept the game close... again.

The clock became the Minutemen's best friend. After the third–ranked Cowboy defense had virtually shut UMass down in the second half. Only time could hold McNeese State back.

"Every time that we weren't making a play, they just gained a lot more momentum," coach Mark Whipple said. "It's a tough place to play, but I think the guys came together and we happened to find a way to win."

The Minutemen crawled across the finish line. After standing tall, and looking so good early in the game in capturing a 21–point lead in the second quarter, the UMass' morale would soon sink and MSU could smell a win.

It was a game of overcoming odds, the Cowboys falling just short of their ultimate destination. On the UMass side, Marcel Shipp, the third leading rusher in the nation, was out with a ruptured bursus in his knee, but freshman Kevin Quinlan, third on the team with 79 yards on the year, tallied 147 yards Saturday night. Adrian Zullo, hobbled by an injury suffered last week against Connecticut, not only played, but caught one of two Todd Bankhead touchdown passes.

"It was scary at first, but I had to calm down before the game," Quinlan said. "I had to forget about the crowd and just play."

Smiles were abundant in Cowboy Country when Quinlan took the field, rather than Shipp. Quinlan, though, out– gained Jesse Burton, MSU's own freshman phenomenon, on the ground, as Burton notched 123 yards, but only eight yards in the fourth quarter, when clock management and quick points were the Cowboys' biggest issue.

Shonz Lafrenz, who had been a perfect 4–for–4 on the evening, missed wide right from 52 yards in the Cowboys' final attempt at victory. Thoughts went back to Shawn Maclean's miss at UNH that helped get the Minutemen to the playoffs and onto next week against the undefeated Patriot League champions, Lehigh.

"We've seen so many of [these games] this year," Whipple said. "[Lafrenz] made enough of them. He's a tremendous weapon, but we had the law of averages on our side."

What else is new, though?

Only two of the Minutemen's 13 games have been decided by more than 10 points. Maybe they like to keep it close, toying with their opponents' heads.

Probably not, though; but as long as the wins keep coming all the way to Chattanooga, Whipple and the boys will not complain, and neither will the fans.

UM hangs in but No. 6 Georgia pulls away

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team fell victim to a twin killing at the hands of No. 6 Georgia 80–57 yesterday at the Mullins Center.

The Lady Bulldogs were paced by the identical Miller sisters, Coco and Kelly, who combined for 48 points and 11 rebounds on the afternoon. Coco led the pair with 27 points.

UMass put up a valiant effort against the seasoned Georgia squad. However, the Miller twins, along with superb post play from Angie Ball, made the difference in the contest.

Entering the game, both teams had to overcome personnel problems. The Minutewomen (1–5), playing their first home game without Kelly Van Huisen and Jaywana Bradley, were faced with a team actually more shorthanded than themselves.

Georgia had only eight serviceable players yesterday, but played with a six–woman rotation for the most part.

The game was closely contested in the first half, as neither team was able to shoot consistently or control the ball.

The lead changed hands several times early on, until Georgia went on a 7–0 run to grab a 19–12 advantage with 7: 26 remaining in the first half.

UMass ended that burst as Tez Kraft (19 points and 8 rebounds) buried an open jumper to cut the deficit to 5.

That shot settled the Minutewomen down as they hung tough with the highly favored Lady Bulldogs throughout the remainder of the half.

Kathy Coyner was one of the settling influences for UMass through the break, as her eight points and two assists helped hold Georgia to a 30–25 advantage.

"We were able to do some of the things we need to be doing early on, Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien said. But we still did not take advantage of the opportunities that were given to us, and we cannot afford to play like that."

As the second half began, Georgia displayed why they are near the top of the national rankings, quickly opening up a nine–point lead on two baskets by Kelly Miller.

UMass would attempt to play catch–up from that point on, but never managed so much as a tie.

The Lady Bulldogs led 41–32 on a jumper from Keisha Brown, but UMass still had one run left in them.

The Minutewomen assembled a 5–0 stretch, courtesy of Nekole Smith's lay–up off a Coyner feed, and a trey from Kraft also compliments of a Coyner dish.

UMass appeared to have had a defensive stop on the next play, but Brown fired the ball off the glass with the shot clock winding down to regain the collective composure for her team.

After Kraft fed a pretty lob pass to Smith for an easy lay– in to cut the lead to 43–39, the Lady Bulldogs began to pull away from the depleted Minutewomen for good.

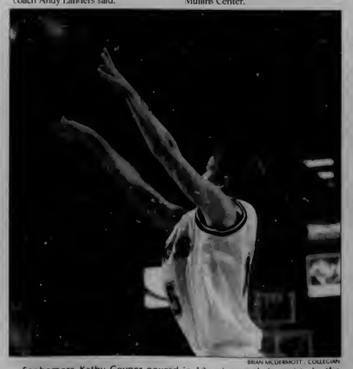
Ball (19 points), who dominated inside play, muscled her way into the basket and subsequently earned a double digit lead for Georgia at 49–39 with 11:58 to play.

UMass would get no closer than seven points after that, as Coyner sunk a pair of free throws to pull the squad to within 50–43.

The game remained within reach for UMass until the last five minutes, when the precision of Georgia, aided by the exhaustion of UMass, began to shine through.

Stamina was clearly an obstacle for UMass, as the team was coming off last weekend's three–game stretch in Hawaii.

It did not help matters that Georgia is a superior running team, which they proved with a 23–4 stronghold on fast break points.



After pulling ahead 61–48, the Lady Bulldogs closed the game with a 19–8 spurt to make the game appear to be less of a battle than it actually was.

"I am not at all surprised the game was a tough win for us," Georgia coach Andy Landers said.

We pulled away at the end, but we were without our best inside player, and I was fully aware that UMass was a quality opponent."

Minutewomen Notes: Kelly Van Huisen is officially out for the second straight season with a torn right ACL...

Jaywana Bradley is also out indefinitely with an injured knee... UMass will take on 97–98 NCAA qualifier Maine Wednesday at 7PM at the Mullins Center.

BRIAN MCGERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Kathy Coyner poured in 18 points and six assists in the Minutewomen loss to No. 6 Georgia.

Miller sisters lead Georgia with 48 points against UM

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Imagine you're about to play a basketball game against a natural talent. This person is quite possibly the single best player you've ever faced. Your opponent scores in the double digits every game and makes it look easy, and now this superstar is zeroing in on you. You and only you.

Now imagine that you have to face another one exactly like her... at the same time.

The Massachusetts women's basketball team was left in this nightmarish position when the No. 6 Georgia Lady Bulldogs came to the William D. Mullins Center yesterday with their twin tandem of Coco and Kelly Miller.

Behind the duo's combined 48 points and 11 rebounds, the undefeated Lady Bulldogs outlasted the Minutewomen for an 80–57 victory.

UMass kept the score close going into the second half, but Georgia's slim 30–25 lead was quickly inflated by the Millers. Kelly put four straight points up for the visitors to begin the Lady Bulldog scoring after halftime, as part of the twins' seven–point overall barrage that extended the lead to nine with 16:48 to go.

"Because we've been playing together so long, I guess we do kind of have a connection," Kelly said of her relationship with her sister on the court.

"The way that we interact with each other out there, I think we kind of pump each other up," Coco agreed. "I think that may help our teammates get more intense and get more fired up."

One by one, the Minutewomen stepped up to try and counteract the combo from Rochester, Minn.

Senior Tez Kraft had a hand in three straight scoring trips for UMass, drilling a three–pointer with 14:24 left, then pitching a short dish to Nekole Smith for two more points less than a minute later. Kraft made another layup with 11:40 on the clock on her way to an 18–point, nine–rebound performance.

All the while, the Coco and Kelly Miller–led offense kept the lead frustratingly large, lowering only to eight points during that span.

Next, sophomore point guard Kathy Coyner went on a tear, scoring six of the team's next eight points, while generating offense for her teammates. The guard also had 18 points on the afternoon to compliment her six assists.

Kelly and Coco responded with open jumpers, the former for three. The latter shot 12 of 16 from the field, and ended with 27 points.

"I think we definitely had to get a hand in her face," Coyner said. "I think [Coco] got a lot of wide open looks, and, yeah, she's a great shooter, but how many would she have made with that hand in her face?"

Coyner was left with the headache of keeping track of the twins, as more often than not she founu herself defending in stereo on fast breaks. Coco went "loco" with five steals, and with her sister, led the Lady Bulldogs to a 25–4 fast–break point advantage over the Minutewomen.

The other Miller, Kelly, contributed with 21 points and seven boards, scoring 13 in the second half. Kelly averages 24 points and seven rebounds a game, while her twin puts 23 and five up, respectively.

When the final gun sounded, it was the energy of the Millers that always kept victory for the 1–5 UMass squad out of reach.

AIDS still devestates sub-Saharan countries

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — AIDS has rapidly crept up on South Africa and poses a tragedy worse than apartheid, the United Nation's top AIDS official said yesterday.

"We are faced with an unprecedented crisis," said Dr. Peter Piot, head of the U.N. AIDS program. He said the scourge is worse than South Africa's former system of white minority rule or natural tragedies like drought.

"None of them will claim so many victims," he said.

Global AIDS figures released last week show the crisis is burning hottest in Africa, particularly the southern part. About two-thirds of the 33 million people worldwide who are infected with the HIV virus that causes AIDS live south of the Sahara. An estimated two million people will die of the disease in sub-Saharan Africa this year, four times the total for the rest of the world.

HIV infection rates in Botswana, Namibia, Swaziland and Zimbabwe — South African neighbors — hover between 20 percent and 25 percent of the adult population, the United Nations said.

Apartheid, which ended in 1994, helped isolate South Africa and made it a latecomer to the AIDS epidemic.

Son, friend arrested in slaying of family

DALTON TOWNSHIP, Mich. (AP) — An 18-year-old was arrested yesterday and accused along with a friend of methodically shooting to death five people — his father, mother, grandfather, brother and his brother's girlfriend.

Authorities said the shootings were stretched out across Sunday afternoon, with the victims probably shot one by one at the family's home. The crime was discovered around midnight Sunday, when the body of the father, an elementary school teacher, was found in his driveway in this rural community.

"The house was scattered with bodies. There was blood everywhere," Prosecutor Tony Tague said. "It's difficult to imagine what possesses 18-year-olds to do something like this." Seth Stephen Privacky, 18, eluded searchers through the night and was arrested yesterday afternoon in a barn a mile from his home. Earlier in the day, police using tracking dogs arrested an 18-year-old man who had been seen running out of the woods not far from the home. The man's name was not immediately released. "What we have here is two young individuals who got involved in a very bad situation and attempted to cover it up," Tague said. Both men were to be arraigned today on murder charges.

Chhim held without bail

Shooting suspect identified by victim's friend, victim

By Lorraine Kennedy
Collegian Staff

The suspect accused of gunning down a University of Massachusetts student in his dorm room is being held without right to bail.

Sokha Chhim, 17, of 16 Amherst Crossing was denied bail in a dangerousness hearing at Hampshire District Court, Northampton last Wednesday. He is being held at the Hampshire County Jail and is scheduled to appear at a pre-trial hearing on Dec. 17.

Detective Brian Narkewicz of the UMass Police Department testified at the hearing that he responded to the report of a shooting at 604E Cashin in the Sylvan Residential Area at 9:20 p.m., on Oct. 30.

Upon arrival, Narkewicz said he observed the victim "lying in a pool of blood...with his head next to the bed." The bullet that injured the victim, he said, came from a .380–caliber gun and had entered the victim's neck, shattered a vertebrae and exited above his left shoulder.

Narkewicz said he observed some "green, leafy vegetable matter" that he determined to be marijuana both in the Cashin elevator and in the victim's room. In addition, he said he saw a triple–beam balance scale "in plain view."

Narkewicz said he spoke to a friend of the victim who had been in the room at the time of the shooting. The detective said he was upset and crying and his "hands were covered in the victim's blood."

The victim's friend gave Narkewicz a description of the assailant as "a hispanic–looking man," who was 5–foot–7, 140 pounds with dark hair, wearing a lighter blue jacket and baggy jeans. The friend "believed him to be young," Narkewicz said.

On Nov. 4, Narkewicz said he met with the victim who was "attached to a respirator...[had] some paralysis in his right arm...[and was] receiving a four milligram dose of morphine." He said the victim was unable to speak at the time, but mouthed the word "shooter" as he pointed to someone in the array of photos. Chhim was not present in that particular array, Narkewicz said.

The detective testified that he met with the victim again on Nov. 16. The victim pointed to the photo of the man he had originally identified as the assailant and said he was "too thin." He instead indicated a picture of Chhim that had been taken on Oct. 29. Narkewicz said the victim had met the man before and his name was "Sokha." The detective testified the victim said he "sold the individual marijuana."

Narkewicz questioned a female student who had been in the company of the victim at 7:30 the night of the shooting. She identified a photo of Chhim as the man whom the victim had introduced to her on Oct. 30 and said in her statement that she believed his name to be "Soko."

Chhim was arrested in Springfield on the morning of Nov. 18, Narkewicz testified. The detective said he had gone to the victim's home and met his parents, whom he spoke with through an interpreter. He testified that the parents said "they had last seen him the Tuesday before. [Chhim had] packed a bag and asked to borrow the car."

According to UMass Chief of Police John Luippold, the incident is still under investigation. "We're still looking for at least one other individual," he said.

Police are not releasing the name of the victim while the investigation is underway.

Welfare recipients may leave school

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Starting today, the two–year limit for Massachusetts welfare recipients will take effect and is expected to force some students to drop out of the University of Massachusetts.

This, in addition to a recent law requiring most recipients, including UMass students, to work 20 hours per week is expected to result in a pronounced drop in the already small number of low–income students.

According to Mahmood Ketabchi, the coordinator of the Educational Access Committee, the number of students at UMass that collect welfare has decreased by 87.8 percent in the past year, from 867 in 1997 to 106 in 1998. This is attributed mostly to the 1995 welfare reform bill, which mandated that most recipients, including full–time college students and single parents, work 20 hours per week in either employment or community service. Previously, the 20 hour requirement could be fulfilled by education/training programs but, as of 1996, recipients must work in addition to their studies. The decline has been even greater among student parents who receive Temporary Assistance for Dependent Children (TAFDC). The figures for low–income students who do not collect welfare were unavailable.

The drop has not been as substantial at Massachusetts community colleges. According to the Massachusetts Law Reform Institute, the total number of community college students who receive TAFDC funds dropped from 7,404 in 1994 to 3,921 in 1997, a decline of 47 percent. The decrease was most significant at Greenfield Community College, where the total dropped 82 percent. The higher rate of TAFDC recipients attending community colleges is attributed mostly to their lower cost.

According to Ketabchi, many students will be forced to leave school only a year or a semester short of graduation.

"For students with children who have reached the time limit, there is literally no way they could continue school at this point," he said.

Ketabchi said welfare reform has also been a significant factor in the recent 54 percent drop in graduate students of color. In neighboring states such as Vermont, there has not been nearly as large a decline. Ketabchi credited this to the fact that "for people on welfare in these states, education is criterion for cash."

Deborah May, a graduate student in sociology, called the state's policy "short–sighted, mean–spirited and stupid." "College education is essential for the financial self– sufficiency of these families," she said.

Recent research has supported this view. According to the Center for Women Policy Studies, a five–state study of welfare recipients found that 81 percent were able to move off of welfare and onto steady employment once they got their college degrees. The report also highlighted the "widespread myth" that welfare automatically pays for educational programs, which it no longer does.

The time limit does have exceptions. Women in the last four–months of their pregnancy can receive funds beyond the two–year limit, as can parents with children under the age of two. Also exempt are individuals under 20, the disabled and senior citizens. The state also allows recipients to petition the Commissioner of the Welfare Department for an extension. According to Western Massachusetts Legal Services, a waiver can be granted if "extraordinary circumstances" can be proven, or "You are a child whose parent has died, lost custody, or been incapacitated, incarcerated or institutionalized."

To protest the time–limit, marches have been held throughout the state, the largest of which took place in Boston on Nov. 21. A number of marches have also been planned for today, including one in Greenfield.

Memorial service to be held for UM student hit by car

A memorial service will be held for the University of Massachusetts student who died Friday as a result of injuries sustained from being struck by a car.

The service for Kerry Hines will be held at Memorial Hall on Thursday, Nov. 3 at 4:30 p.m.

The 25–year–old senior biology major had been in the intensive care unit at Baystate Medical Center in Springfield since she was hit by a car on Infirmary Way in front of Hills House on Nov. 11.

According to Kay Scanlan, of the UMASS News Office, a cremation has already taken place and no funeral arrangements have been released by Hines' family, who reside in Randolph.

Charges against the driver of the car, 52–year–old Appollos Ibedigbo, of 29 Tamarack Drive, Amherst, have been reviewed by the Hampshire County District Attorney's office and a new charge of motor vehicle homicide by negligent operation is being sought, UMass Chief of Police John Luippold said yesterday.

Ibedigbo is the assistant director of the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students (CCEBMS) at UMass.

Clinton asks U.S. boost aid to Palestinians by $400 million

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat yesterday accused Israel of undermining the Palestinian economy and said anew that he hopes to establish an independent state. Even so, President Clinton said the Mideast peace effort was on track and pledged additional U.S. aid for Gaza and the West Bank.

Arafat spoke to a U.S.–arranged international conference designed to solicit hundreds of millions of dollars in pledges of assistance to the Palestinian economy. Opening the conference, Clinton said his administration planned to boost U.S. aid by $400 million while extending a current $100–million–a–year assistance program for five more years.

Appealing for generous contributions, Clinton said: "There has been too little tangible improvement in the life of the Palestinian people."

Lasting peace has little chance of taking hold "if it does not deliver results for ordinary people," he said.

Arafat, following Clinton to the speaker's rostrum after the news media were directed to leave the State Department auditorium, said past pledges had enabled the Palestinians "to advance the peace process, develop the economy and proceed forward to realize our independence."

But despite "your generous financial assistance," Arafat told delegates from more than 40 nations, "momentous constraints" have made the suffering of the Palestinian people unbearable.

"The Israeli closure policy is the primary and direct cause for the dangerous decline in the performance of the Palestinian economy over the past five years," Arafat said.

A text of Arafat's remarks was released to reporters.

He referred to the policy of Israel's current Likud government and previous Labor governments to close the borders to Gaza and the West Bank to try to stifle terrorists who hatch their plots in and come from Palestinian–controlled areas.

The closures and partial closures have the effect also of severely limiting access to jobs in Israel for tens of thousands of Palestinian workers.

Clinton said the United States had staged the conference "to send a clear signal that this peace is more than a piece of paper." He added: "We must convince those who have invested so much in this process that it was a sound investment."

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright said the $500 million pledged by the United States at the first donors conference in 1993 had improved access to water for more than 250,000 people, provided 10,000 loans to Palestinian entrepreneurs and helped fund the first–ever elections in Gaza and the West Bank.

The increase in U.S. aid, which is subject to congressional approval, was announced after Clinton met with Arafat at the White House and then spoke at the conference at the State Department. Clinton said Arafat had reaffirmed his pledge to uphold his side of agreements with Israel and to work with Israel to ensure security.

The new U.S. money is designed to spur stepped-up contributions from more than 40 nations assembled here for a one-day conference on economic assistance for the West Bank and Gaza.

Five years ago, more than $2 billion was pledged.

The nearly doubling of U.S. aid is based on the notion that combating poverty in Palestinian-controlled areas will promote peace agreements with Israel and curb conflict.

The pace of delivering the $400 million boost will be determined after development projects are identified, an official told The Associated Press on condition he not be identified.

The United States is providing $500 million over five years to Arafat's Palestinian Authority. Other nations have contributed $2.1 billion, which U.S. sponsors of the donors conference hope to see increased.

Arafat, here to oversee the pledges, is also urging Clinton to help ensure Mideast peace efforts.

On Sunday, Arafat reiterated his intention to proclaim statehood for the Palestinians next year.

In response, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu threatened in Jerusalem to walk away from accords with Arafat if the Palestinian leader tried unilaterally to set up a state. Palestinian negotiator Hassan Asfour said the Palestinians are paying no heed to Netanyahu's threats. "Let him shout as much as he pleases," Asfour said of the Israeli leader.

Arafat had a meeting scheduled with Clinton in advance of the international donors conference, which the president was due to open.

Together, they are reviewing implementation of the land-for-security agreement between Israel and the Palestinian Authority that Clinton hammered through in October in Maryland. As officials gathered for the conference, they were confronted with a London Times story on the front page of The Washington Times accusing Arafat's Palestinian Authority of using $20 million in aid from Britain and other European countries intended for poor Palestinians to build luxury apartments for a general, a police chief and "other acolytes" of the Palestinian leader.

Clinton plans to visit Israel, the West Bank and Gaza Dec. 12-15. He will address the Palestinian National Council and oversee implementation of a critical element of the peace accord with Israel reached in October.

The council, meeting in Gaza on Dec. 14, is due to reaffirm the revocation of clauses in the Palestine Liberation Organization's charter calling for Israel's destruction.

Five years ago, $2.3 billion was pledged at a similar conference to assist the Palestinians in the West Bank and in Gaza. A total of $2.1 billion was disbursed.

Russian budget debate canceled, IMF wants plan

By Anna Dolgov
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Russia's government canceled a budget debate yesterday, one day before a visit by the head of the International Monetary Fund — which is demanding a sound budget as a condition for giving more aid to the crisis-ridden country.

The budget discussion was first rescheduled Thursday, then postponed until next week. The government insisted the delay was not connected with the visit by IMF chief Michel Camdessus, but gave few other details.

The Cabinet of Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov has warned Russia would suffer serious problems if it doesn't get more aid from the IMF. But the IMF and Western governments say they won't provide any cash until Russia adopts a realistic budget.

Russia's shaky markets, aggravated by the Asian crisis, collapsed in August after the government defaulted on treasury debts and effectively devalued the currency. Since then, the government has produced no comprehensive plans to tackle the crisis.

The IMF froze a $22.6 billion loan package in August after the crisis erupted.

Still, the Russian government is including IMF aid in next year's budget.

Alexander Pochinok, a senior economic policymaker, was quoted as saying Sunday that a 1999 draft budget assumes that Russia will receive the remaining $17.5 billion from the IMF-led bailout package reached in July — an inclusion criticized by the IMF mission that visited Moscow earlier this month.

But the IMF, under increasing criticism for its policies amid economic troubles worldwide, is also eager to ensure that Russia pays off its debts to foreign creditors, including the IMF.

Unlicensed teen–ager arrested in hit–and–run, faces multiple charges

By Leslie Miller
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE — Police yesterday arrested an unlicensed 16-year-old girl whose road trip with three young friends ended in the hit-and-run death of a Cambridge man Thanksgiving Eve. Police say the girl ran away from the crash scene after driving from her home 40 miles away in Pawtucket, R.I.

Yesterday, at about 1 p.m., the girl walked into Cambridge Police Headquarters accompanied by her parents and her attorney, Cambridge police spokesman Frank Pasquarello said.

Police suspect she had been hiding with a friend in the Boston area.

"I said from the very beginning she didn't go to Rhode Island," said Pasquarello. "I had a feeling at 16 years old, you're on the run, your friends are hiding you."

The accident happened Wednesday around 7 p.m. as 30-year-old Dennis Scott walked with his wife, daughter and brother-in-law on Main Street near Central Square in Cambridge. A Toyota suddenly careened onto the sidewalk, hit Scott and his 2-year-old daughter, Sadie, and then struck a telephone pole.

Police said the suspect ran away with one of her passengers while two others remained behind to tell police what had happened. The friend who had fled, also a 16-year-old from Pawtucket, surrendered to police Friday. She was arraigned yesterday on two counts of accessory after the fact and held on $1,000 cash bail. The driver of the car was taken to juvenile court and charged with misdemeanor motor vehicle homicide, leaving the scene of an accident causing death, leaving the scene of an accident causing property damage, operating to endanger, unlicensed operation and unauthorized use of a motor vehicle.

She is being held on $5,000 cash bail.

The search for the suspect took police to Pawtucket and Providence, R.I.

Groups accuse MCI of failure to comply

WASHINGTON (AP) — Two groups accused MCI WorldCom yesterday of not complying with federal regulators' order to stop charging certain customers its highest rates.

Earlier this month, the Federal Communications Commission directed the company to cease charging those customers "nonsubscriber" or "casual calling" rates. To comply with the FCC's action, MCI filed a revised tariff to the commission. But a law firm, Halprin, Temple, Goodman & Sugrue, and Freedom Technologies Inc., a telecommunications consulting company owned by Albert Halprin, a partner in the law firm, and his wife, contend in a filing to the FCC that the revised tariff does not comply with the FCC's order. The two groups initiated the casual calling case against MCI.

MCI spokesman Brad Burns responded: "We're confident that the changes we did make in our tariff address the FCC's concerns...and fully comply with the FCC's order."

Halprin said the revised tariff does not cover all MCI customers who are dropped from the company's "billing system" and, as a result, are its highest rates.

For instance, people who are dropped from the billing system after moving are not covered by the revised tariff. They would continue to be billed, but at the highest rate instead of the one to which they subscribed.

MCI's casual customers pay a $2.49 surcharge and 38 cents a minute for each call.

People who are dropped from the billing system after accruing several unpaid bills, however, would no longer be bumped to the highest rate, under MCI's revised tariff. Instead, their service would be terminated.

The FCC's order applied only to customers who had selected MCI as their primary long-distance carrier and then were billed at the company's highest rate. It does not apply to people who have not chosen MCI as their primary long-distance carrier but use it occasionally by dialing an access code.

House Judiciary Chairman denounces Clinton's answers

By Laurie Kellman
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The chairman of the House Judiciary Committee sharply attacked President Clinton's answers to impeachment investigators yesterday, saying Clinton "chose to evade" questions in a manner that could force the panel to accept allegations as fact.

"He has made it very clear he is going to stick with his reliance on bizarre technical definitions and legalistic defenses," Rep. Henry Hyde (R-Ill.) said in a statement on the written answers Clinton submitted last Friday in response to 81 questions.

Meanwhile, the White House brushed off an invitation to have Clinton testify. "I don't think it's very likely you'll see the president appear before that committee," White House spokesman Joe Lockhart said.

Hyde said he would still welcome Clinton or his lawyers to make a presentation of facts before the committee to rebut evidence concerning allegations of perjury and obstruction of justice submitted by Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr.

"Instead of shedding new light on the key facts, the president chose to evade them," Hyde said in his statement. "He did not challenge the truthfulness of the evidence. Rather his responses revealed a selective ability to recall information."

"If the president leaves undisputed the record of where he has given evasive responses, we will be forced to assume that the corroborated evidence is accurate," Hyde added.

Republicans had suggested that Clinton might back off his insistence that he did not commit perjury in the Monica Lewinsky case. But Clinton's written answers continued to assert that while some of his earlier testimony was misleading, it was legally accurate.

In his responses, Clinton said more than a dozen times he could not recall information, and other times he simply cited earlier testimony.

Hyde's committee ran into another obstacle yesterday.

During a private session with investigators, Maryland Democratic operative Nathan Landow invoked his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and declined to answer questions, according to a committee official who spoke only on condition of anonymity. Landow refused to comment as he left the hour-long meeting.

Committee members and aides tried to question the real estate developer about whether he was aware of any effort to influence the testimony of former White House volunteer Kathleen Willey, who has accused Clinton of making a sexual advance in 1993. Mrs. Willey has testified she discussed her testimony with Landow.

Republican investigators also hope to question White House aide Bruce Lindsey, one of Clinton's closest advisers, late this week. But they are leaning away from their original plans to summon Robert Bennett, Clinton's private lawyer in the Paula Jones sexual harassment suit, according to two GOP officials who demanded anonymity.

The committee prepared for a hearing today, its third since the inquiry began, to explore what Republicans said were "the consequences of perjury and related crimes.

Minn. mom pleads guilty to strangling her six children

By Bill Wareham
Associated Press

ST. PAUL, Minn. — A sobbing mother pleaded guilty yesterday to murdering her six children, ages 5 to 11, in what her attorney said was a fit of suicidal distress.

"I strangled their necks," said Khoua Her, a Laotian-born Hmong woman who spoke through an interpreter as Ramsey County prosecutor Chris Wilton asked her to describe the Sept. 3 killings. The 24-year-old pleaded guilty to second-degree murder, agreeing to a 50-year sentence that would make her eligible for parole in a little more than 33 years. She avoided a possible first-degree murder conviction that would have brought an automatic life sentence.

"This was her only opportunity to cut a deal where she may get out someday," said defense attorney Bruce Wenger. "She's doing way, way, way too much time, but the risks were too great should we go to a jury and lose."

Her stared at the floor and cried through much of the hearing as the prosecutor sought details about the deaths of her three sons and three daughters. Each of the six times she was asked whether she intended to kill her victim, she replied: "Yes."

She said the children were outside playing on the evening of the murders. She called them in one by one and tied a piece of black cloth around their necks.

Under questioning from Wenger, Her said she was suicidal the day of the killings and murdered the children because she was worried about what would happen to her children after she died.

"If I died, then nobody would love my children," she said. Police found Her lying semiconscious with an extension cord wrapped around her neck.

Wenger later said Her was distraught by a lifetime of anguish, which included time in refugee camps, a forced marriage at age 12, sexual abuse and financial trouble. She was estranged from the children's father, Tou Hang, at the time of the killings.

The prosecutor said no emotional problems could excuse her actions.

"It's hard for me to have compassion for someone who kills six children," Wilton said.

Audit finds weakness in IRS controls

By Curt Anderson
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Internal Revenue Service used unarmed bicycle couriers to transport millions of dollars in taxpayer checks and hired employees for sensitive positions before completing their background checks, according to an audit released yesterday.

IRS Commissioner Charles Rossotti said he "generally agreed" with results of the audit by the congressional General Accounting Office but added that the IRS is already taking steps to shore up several security weaknesses.

"We recognize that financial crimes and identity fraud committed through the theft of receipts and tax return data not only harm the government but taxpayers and banks as well," Rossotti said in a written response. "We are committed to mitigating this risk."

The GAO study involved visits to IRS service centers in Atlanta, Philadelphia, Austin, Texas, and Ogden, Utah, April 20-23, during this year's tax filing peak. Practices at district offices in Los Angeles, northern California and north Texas also were observed. At all four service centers, investigators found that unarmed couriers driving civilian cars alone or riding bicycles were used to deliver tens of millions of dollars in taxpayer checks. One courier, the GAO found, left a $200 million deposit unattended in a car with a window open. In another instance, a vulnerable bicycle messenger was entrusted with up to $100 million in deposits every day. The sites of neither of the incidents was identified.

Although the deposits did not include cash, taxpayer checks contain such private information as bank account and Social Security numbers, names and addresses and signatures. They can be "cloned" using account numbers into fake bank accounts if stolen. "The theft of one peak season deposit could place a significant administrative burden on (the) IRS to contact taxpayers and initiate stop payment orders on tens of thousands of checks," GAO investigators wrote, although the audit did not identify any instances of such a theft.

But the GAO did cite lack of adequate background checks in 12 of the 80 IRS employee thefts investigated from January 1995 to July 1997. Those 80 thefts totaled some $5.3 million.

In most cases, delays in receiving fingerprint results, combined with a crush of new hires during peak filing season, meant that some people were on the job before their backgrounds were thoroughly investigated. These employees handle cash, checks and private taxpayer information.

The IRS hired 20,000 seasonal employees this year to handle peak filing season, when up to 100,000 pieces of mail a day are received and processed at agency service centers. The fingerprint checks took an average of 68 days — one took 141 days — instead of the 21 days that had been expected.

The GAO also found that taxpayer checks were often stored in unrestricted areas contrary to IRS policy, meaning unauthorized employees would have greater access to them. In one case, the documents were stored in a hallway adjacent to a fitness center where anyone could enter unchallenged.

In his response, Rossotti said the agency intends to have better deposit transport methods in place by August 1999 and that other security improvements involving handling of receipts should be ready by Jan. 1, 1999.

The IRS also intends to install new fingerprint scanners at 17 sites within two months — including the 10 service centers — which can complete FBI checks within five days, Rossotti said.

Still, Sen. William Roth, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee that oversees IRS, expressed dismay over the audit's findings.

LONDON — The London hospital where Gen. Augusto Pinochet is being held under police guard said yesterday that the former Chilean dictator no longer needs special medical care and should quickly find another place to stay.

The statement by the Grovelands Priory appeared to be a new blow to any hopes the 83-year-old Pinochet had of fighting extradition to Spain on grounds he is unfit for trial.

The private psychiatric hospital, sounding openly impatient, noted at a Nov. 17 bail hearing that lawyers had said Pinochet, who underwent back surgery Oct. 9, was fit enough to appear in court. He is now due to appear Dec. 11.

"It is now the responsibility of Gen. Pinochet's advisers to find alternative accommodation," the hospital statement said. "The management of Grovelands Priory has reminded his advisers of this responsibility and it is hoped that Gen. Pinochet will find alternative accommodation as soon as possible."

Pinochet was arrested Oct. 16 in his hospital bed on a warrant issued by a Spanish magistrate, and has not been seen in public. The former dictator underwent surgery in the London Clinic, a private hospital in London. On Oct. 29, he was moved to Grovelands Priory, some five miles from central London.

There was no immediate word on where Pinochet might go. News reports have said he is planning a move to a nine-bedroom home on the private Wentworth estate in Surrey, southwest of London. Chilean Foreign Minister Jose Miguel Insulza flew to Madrid yesterday after four days of trying to persuade Britain not to extradite Pinochet to Spain to face charges of murder, genocide and torture by secret police during his 1973-90 rule.

Insulza maintained Pinochet may be tried in Chile if he is allowed to go home.

In Madrid, the Chilean foreign minister said he didn't have "any expectations" from his two-day visit to Spain other than to gain information.

However, Insulza told reporters: "The political climate in Spain is not favorable to Sen. Pinochet and that carries weight in the judicial process even beyond the will of the judges to be impartial."

Neither endorsing nor condemning Spain's extradition request, State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said yesterday the international community should show "significant respect" to Chile's efforts to deal with the legacy of Pinochet's regime. The Clinton administration is divided between those who support the extradition request and those who argue that it could threaten Chile's fragile democracy. There is also concern it would set a precedent that could make U.S. leaders targets of extradition requests in foreign countries.

A London newspaper, The Mirror, quoted Pinochet's nephew as saying that he would rather die than stand trial in Spain. "He would rather kill himself or be killed by his guards than face the humiliation and indignity of being sent to face trial in Spain," nephew Rafael Pinochet Saavedra was quoted as saying. The general's wife, Lucia, told the tabloid that Pinochet was "very weak and depressed about his position."

A Chilean government report says 3,197 people were murdered or disappeared at the hands of his secret police after Pinochet overthrew a Marxist who had been elected.

Pinochet has immunity from prosecution in Chile. Critics say that even if this were lifted he would appear before a military court packed with his supporters.

Home Secretary Jack Straw has until Dec. 11 to decide whether to permit extradition proceedings to begin.

A touch of class

Pre-registration has come and gone. And maybe you got the class you wanted. Or maybe you didn't. If you haven't noticed, there's sometimes a dearth of really good classes, especially in the English major (Oh, my beloved English major). The problem is, in trying to offer everything, the school may have stretched itself a little thin. But on the other hand, there are some really valuable classes out there that may have slipped by your radar.

Here's a preview of the fabulous new classes soon to be offered at this fine university. They're UMass–erific.

Canadian 101 — "Don't be a hoser, eh. Finally, you can look good when Quebec secession and "curling" come up in conversation. Learn to talk the talk and walk the walk with the finest your Northern neighbors have to offer. We will have a field trip to a minor league hockey game, see them turn a good wheel, drink some Molson, eh. We'll show you what it's all about. No books, eh, but a bunch of John Candy movies. Especially Wagons East."

Jonathan Taylor Thomas in Transition 501 — "Can everyone's favorite boy star become his own man in the wake of leaving 'Home Improvement?' Can J.T.T. be any cuter? What is his favorite color? Could he win in a fight with Danny Pinatauro, from 'Who's the Boss?' What about with Tony Danza? Judith Light? We'll answer these questions, and explore the homoerotic subtext of his early work. Required reading: Tiger Beat! Satisfies a diversity requirement."

Mike Messaros

Labor Movement and Protesting 230 — "Because only your cause matters. Learn the precise way to protest, from not holding the sign upside-down to coming up with clever catchphrases. We will come up with our own groups as part of an in-class assignment. Past groups that we've come up with are the left-handed smokeshifters, the pissed–off newspaper columnists and the Christian Right (yup, that was our fault). Special guest lecturer Jimmy 'the Hammer' Santucci, who came up with the catchphrase 'Hell no, we won't go!'"

Random Professor Stories 163 — "There was a day when students gave respect to their professors. That day was when I used to play the clarinet, and my mother would shout up the stairs, 'Knock that racket off.' I told my mother that I got that clarinet for a sawbuck over at Woolsworth. In reality, I won it in a mean game of marbles behind the old warehouse. Came out with a couple of aggies and a cat's eye, too, I'll tell you. But anyway, I wore this suit yesterday, and I'll wear it tomorrow. Why? It doesn't smell bad yet."

Avoiding People 300 — "Teaches you how to quietly avoid that old roommate, that scary obsessive type or just people you don't want to deal with. Includes the popular 'Wow, look at that ceiling' move to avoid eye contact, or the seminal 'Oh, is something in my eye? Let me rub my eye while looking in the opposite direction of the oncoming foot traffic.' Attendance is required."

Mikeology 101 — "'What's your major?' you say to the fine lady, and she tells you. Then you say, 'You ever think about switching over to Mikeology?' Fine ladies only. Prereq: ENGLWP 112."

Gallagher and Jane Austen 449 — "You'd think the king of watermelon smashing and the queen of manners wouldn't have anything in common. Maybe you are right. But we will have fun watching a bunch of comedy lovers dive under plastic tarps as that frizzy–haired genius smashes some fruit. Recommended for English majors who want their resume to appear even more esoteric, making them even less employable."

Not Very Good British Writers 204 — "We will explore the lesser knowns of the British canon, from Christopher St. Hubbins, whose medieval poem, 'Tooth Decay, the Magical Chimp,' was thought to have given rise to the plague (he was subsequently drawn and quartered) to the more recent Sir Edward Autumnbottom, whose line of mystery novels feature Lord Cranberry, an amateur detective who always solves the mystery on the first page, then spends the next 400 pages rubbing his calloused feet. Other not very good books include Jimmy Henry's Jimmy Has Clap, Edna McDermott's Who Stole My Smile? (a collection of poetry) and Steven San VanDerWal's France and Why I Hate It."

Making Bad Bets 542 — "Someone actually thought that John Glenn was going to die in space. Can you believe that? They thought it was some master plan and they made a bet with someone and they lost! Wow! Please take this class. I'm up for tenure. Satisfies an R2 requirement."

If you take advantage of these courses just right, you can be more in demand than a computer science major with insomnia (Get it? Come on...). I have a friend who moved to Canada after graduation (he said it was to avoid the war. I said, "What war?" He said, "I see they've gotten to you, too.") and got a job translating old episodes of "Hollywood Squares" into Canadian. "Where do most couples say is the strangest place to make whoopee?" became "Where do most couples say is the strangest place to make whoopee, eh?" It was as easy as that. (The answer, by the way, translated into Canadian as "Near a bear trap, eh.")

But that is neither here nor there. You should take advantage of these fine courses, pepper your resume with them, show those future employers that you are not just a student of UMass, but a student of the world. If you don't, you'll be less popular than an English major who claims to write poetry in his free time.

Night Rider

Early Thanksgiving morning, around 1 a.m., there was an accident at my house. My sister and I heard tires squealing but for a second they had stopped. Then came two loud crashes, seemingly right outside the window. I followed my sister outside to find a truck upside down in our front yard.

After waking my parents and calling the Granby police, I ran back outside. My sister had gone to the lone person in the truck to see if he was injured, which he was not.

However, while I was waking my parents and calling the police, I began to form an opinion of the accident. At such a late hour and because there were no other cars around, I assumed the accident was the driver's fault. In fact, when I ran out the second time, I did not ask "Is anyone hurt?" Instead, I yelled to my sister "Did it hit your car?" Only after she replied "no" did I ask if there were injuries.

Maybe I prematurely blamed the victim for the accident, but I had no reason to judge otherwise. Perhaps this shows my materialistic side, but I think it is more that I did not want to be involved in the ordeal of an accident. If mine or my sister's car had been damaged, countless hours and likely dollars would be lost in the court system. At that moment, I had no desire to involve myself in a stranger's self–inflicted problems.

Once the victim's seatbelt was cut, my thoughts converged with an indifferent attitude toward the victim. I'm not cold and uncaring, though, for it was obvious from the beginning that the victim was highly intoxicated. Therefore, because the accident was solely his fault and preventable, there was no reason for me to sympathize with him.

As I told the first officer who arrived, the situation would have been very different if he had hit one of our cars, or worse, one of us. Since the truck was only twenty feet from my sister's car, it was difficult for her and I to ignore how close we were to yelling at the victim rather than helping him. It relieved me greatly to know that neither he nor the police and courts will affect my life much.

After a second officer arrived, the victim's information was taken, followed by a field sobriety test. Besides smelling like beer, he appeared to fail the test. Obviously, the cause of the accident was intoxication, regardless if he was speeding. However, this is not a call to lock up any one who drinks and drives. Yes, many people who drive intoxicated should not be on the road and cause countless accidents. I certainly do not condone this driving.

Jason Wiesenbach

But, there are many sober drivers that should not be driving. Have you ever been ruthlessly tailgated because you decided to drive the speed limit that day? To me, compulsively late drivers who disregard red lights and make drivers in front of them nervous are just as dangerous as many drunk drivers. Furthermore, I know of many legally drunk drivers who can drive perfectly, yet would be subject of arrest under current laws.

Therefore, I do not believe automatic condemnation of anyone who drives while legally drunk is in order. Laws cannot prevent alcohol–related accidents unless we create a police state on our roadways. They also cannot prevent accidents caused by poor drivers without going to extremes either. I believe leaving drivers alone is the best course.

Whether drunk or sober, a driver should be judged by actions, not by chemical condition. If the driver creates hazardous road conditions for others, society should limit their legal driving ability. However, if they don't create any problems, we should leave them alone. This reactionary approach to poor or intoxicated drivers keeps the decision in the driver's hands of whether s/he can drive. Poor driving judgments cannot be eliminated, and this approach preserves the driver's freedom.

In terms of accident witnesses, too, we must continue to allow for personal freedom. During the two officers' questions, my sister told them she had smelled the alcohol immediately on the victim's breath. They asked for a written statement, which would support their assessment.

However, this would expose her to a court summons for an accident whose cause was simple to determine. A court summons could force her to miss class or work and also prolong any connection we have with this accident. Considering the circumstances, we have no reason to continue involvement.

One of the officers, though, thought otherwise, and attempted to pressure her into signing the statement. The officer was annoyed that people would hurt their investigation by refusing to "cooperate." He also told me the pictures I had taken would be summoned into court. Whether this officer was angry at the driver or something else, there is no reason for him to use his authority to threaten us with a court summons.

We did not cause this accident and did not want to press charges against the driver. Therefore, we deserved the right to reject any involvement in the case, considering the police had more than enough evidence to suspend his license.

Driving mistakes should be weighted equally, sober or not, for most stem from poor driver judgement. Until mistakes occur, we should not single out drivers based on chemical condition. Moreover, freedom to drive until something occurs must extend to witnesses of the mistake also, as their unneeded involvement can only compound stresses in their own lives.

Songs of faith and devotion

We all love songs, but not necessarily the same ones. It is as hard to appreciate other people's songs as it is to share your own. My friend Matty has a taste for electronic trance music. For him it is like flytrance music. For me it is like listening to a broken answering machine trying to play piano. On the other hand, I love American indie rock, the patience and sadness of it, the mad conviction the bands have that if one chord sounds good, then it will sound twenty times as good played twenty times in a row. Matty thinks it sounds boring and whiny. My grandma gets headaches from hisZp–hop music. Half of my friends pretend to vomit when someone mentions the word "country."

You can not make someone love a song. You can not make them understand. And I have only mentioned music from the United States. What about music from other parts of the world? I have a CD of Tuvan throat singers from central Asia. To sing, they manipulate their tongues and windpipes to produce two distinct tones at once. To me, it sounds like a reed flute dueting with a lawnmower, but somewhere souls are broken and reborn in its light.

To get to the point, I am a white American, three generations of my family born here, and this summer I dated a girl who was born in China and moved here when she was seven. Jean, who is going to laugh when she reads this. At first, it was pop songs that brought us together. It was what we talked about over a quiet moment at work, what we filled pauses in phone conversations with. She is one of those otherwise reasonable young adults who still believes in rock stars, British pop especially: Blur, Pulp, James, the NME next–big–thing–of–the–week, all of it, the way British pop songs soar and know they soar. Not my favorite, but I could understand how she felt. In return, she put up with my love of American country/blues/pop, my Lucinda Williams and Car Power.

Best of all, were the songs in between: Grant Lee Buffalo's earthy, miniature operas, Versus' tight, emotional bash–pop, Beth Orton's floating spacey blues. The band's names are not important. They were important because they were something we could share.

But being together was not as easy as agreeing on a radio station in the car.

There was the night we went out to eat at a Vietnamese restaurant in Boston. I figured that I would play it safe and order some sort of noodle product.

Before I knew it, there was a string of tripe wrapped around my fork and I was saying something like "Sure, I'll try it. How weird could it be?" Between the tripe and the broth, a taste I don't even know the words to describe, my stomach got confused, then angry, finally deciding to gather forces for a full–scale rebellion on my mouth. I sensed the growing discontent, and compensated by drinking at least five glasses of water to slosh my stomach to sleep. The worst part was not my queasiness, but how much I wanted to enjoy the food she loved, and that I couldn't. She did not want to be disappointed with me and my limited stomach, but she was.

"We have had very different lives. We are each full of things that the other cannot easily understand..."

Rob Roensch

We have had very different lives. We are each full of things that the other cannot easily understand, full of seemingly untranslatable songs. There is her song of the distant country where she was born, her song of two languages. There is my song of screaming at televised football games, my song of growing up surrounded by people who looked exactly like me. Her song of giant bowls of soup with tendon and tripe, my song of french fries at all hours of the day and night. Her family, my family. The way I know exactly where I belong. The way she isn't sure.

What were we supposed to do? What would we have had to give up? What would we have gained? I may never know. Right then, it was just too hard.

But it was not always too hard. There was my love of wearing the same shorts four days in a row and her love of making fun of me for wearing the same shorts four days in a row. There was her love of talking, my love of letting her talk. Our love of Boston and photographs. There was the day we went to see Grant Lee Buffalo in the city. It was late summer, afternoon, warm. We came in over the river, parked, went into the club, stood patiently packed together with a few hundred other kids until the lights went down and the band came out. They played loud. The lead singer sweated through his shirt, someone blew smoke into my ear, the kids bobbed their heads. There was rock and roll and all was right in the world.

I can not help thinking that we have it in ourselves to overcome differences without losing ourselves in the process. In the end, we can not share the same dreams for the workings of the world, but we can share a world. We can not share the same songs, but we can share a love of music.

Microsoft allegedly polluted Java; antitrust trial continues this week

By Ted Bridis
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Microsoft antitrust trial turns this week to an increasingly important charge and one where the company has already proved vulnerable: its efforts to alter a rival computer language that potentially threatens Windows.

To support allegations that Microsoft Corp. sought illegally to maintain monopoly power over computer operating systems, the government argues that Microsoft moved illegally to "pollute" Java, a programming language developed by Sun Microsystems Inc. Software written using Java can run on a variety of computers, minimizing the importance of Windows. Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates once wrote in e-mail the Java threat "scares the hell out of me." "Sun wanted to rally other strong competitors of Microsoft around the Java technology as a means to knock Windows out," Microsoft spokesman Jim Cullinan said. "They wanted to replace Windows."

The government alleges that Microsoft encouraged developers to write software using a Windows-only version of Java that Microsoft distributed as part of its Internet browser software under a disputed sales agreement with Sun.

Justice Department lawyer David Boies yesterday called the government's charge that Microsoft tried illegally to maintain its Windows dominance "the core of the case."

"Microsoft viewed Java as a bacillus directed at the heart of the Windows monopoly," said Stephen Houck, the lead lawyer for the 20 states suing Microsoft with Justice.

The government will call one of Java's creators, James Gosling, as one of its dozen trial witnesses. His written testimony, prepared in advance at the judge's request, could be released as early as this afternoon.

Microsoft was expected to begin questioning Gosling tomorrow.

People familiar with Gosling's testimony say it includes few bombshells, but Gosling's significance — and Microsoft's vulnerability over Java — grew dramatically two weeks ago with a federal ruling in a contract dispute with Sun in San Jose, Calif. In that case, U.S. District Judge Ronald Whyte issued a preliminary injunction against Microsoft preventing it from selling any version of Java incompatible with Sun's so-called "pure Java," distributed as part of Netscape Communications Corp.'s Internet browser.

Microsoft argues that it never forced software developers to write programs using its altered Java, which relies for convenience on Windows for some advanced features. But programs written using the altered Java can't be run on rival operating systems.

"We believe that developers having a choice is always a good thing, and that's what we've done in the Java area," Gates said in interview earlier in November with The Associated Press.

Microsoft's lead lawyer in the Washington antitrust trial argued in his opening statements that "software developers creating Java applications are very well aware of the consequences of choosing to use those tools."

Yesterday, at the start of the trial's seventh week, Microsoft tried to show that its aggressive business tactics haven't entirely prevented computer makers from selling Netscape's rival Internet software.

Microsoft lawyer Michael Lacovara questioned economist Frederick Warren-Boulton about Gateway Inc., the nation's second-leading computer maker, which offers consumers Internet software from both Microsoft and Netscape.

Among its charges, the government also alleges that Microsoft illegally hindered Netscape from distributing its competing Internet software by "tying" its own browser into Windows, and through exclusionary contracts with the world's computer makers and Internet providers.

Microsoft, for example, never prohibited computer makers from installing Netscape's software, but prevents them under sales agreements from removing its own Internet Explorer browser as part of Windows.

The government alleges that practice discourages computer makers away from Netscape because it forces them to conduct additional, expensive testing to ensure there are no compatibility problems with software installed from both vendors.

"The point is, they've got to test the system twice," said Warren-Boulton, on his fourth day of cross-examination. "If you use IE (Internet Explorer), you've got to test it once."

Microsoft contends it made its browser part of Windows because of consumer demand and technical benefits, legal under federal antitrust laws.

Father of missing girl faces charges

By Mike Schneider
Associated Press

CLERMONT, Fla. — A father who reported his 6-year-old daughter missing on Thanksgiving Day confessed yesterday to killing the girl and dumping her body in a remote area of central Florida, authorities said.

Richard Adams, 24, was charged with murdering his daughter, Kayla McKean. Kayla's stepmother, Marcie Adams, was not charged. "Right now, only the father is charged," said Capt. Chris Daniels, a spokesman for the Lake County Sheriff's Office. "We're not going to discuss the details of whether she is involved or what her involvement might be."

He said Ms. Adams is cooperating with investigators, who offered no motive for the killing.

Earlier yesterday, Kayla's mother said she was given a polygraph test.

Gas merger may close service stations

By Eric R. Quinonoes
Associated Press

NEW YORK — A merger between Exxon and Mobil could prompt government antitrust watchdogs to insist the new company sell off numerous gas stations and refineries, putting thousands of jobs in jeopardy.

"Everyone is kind of scared," Richard Hidalgo, a 26-year veteran of Mobil's 1,200-employee refinery in Beaumont, Texas, said yesterday. "No one really knows what's going to happen."

Even without a divestiture order from the government, analysts predict thousands of job cuts, with estimates reaching as high as 20,000 — or about 16 percent of the combined work force.

"What you're talking about here is a classic cost-cutting scenario...You merge two companies together and you basically put one or two of them," said Michael Young, an analyst with Deutsche Bank Securities in Boston.

But even though the merger would form the world's largest oil company, most analysts said yesterday they don't expect worries about industry dominance to be strong enough to kill the deal.

"When the final analysis is made, it will be determined that the industry remains highly fragmented and highly competitive," Young said.

Exxon Corp. and Mobil Corp., the nation's two biggest oil companies, announced last week they were in merger negotiations. A deal, which would probably be structured as an Exxon purchase, would likely be in the $60 billion-plus range, making it the richest of all time.

Still, a combined Exxon-Mobil would represent just 4 percent of global oil production capacity. The Federal Trade Commission could, however, be troubled by the companies' total share of U.S. gasoline sales, which was about 20 percent last year, according to the trade publication National Petroleum News.

Analysts said regulators will surely aim at reducing the companies' concentration of gas stations in the Northeast, particularly in New York and New Jersey. Mobil is the former Standard Oil of New York, a major piece of what was once John D. Rockefeller's oil monopoly, Standard Oil Trust. Exxon is the former Standard Oil of New Jersey.

Other regions of concern could be the Southwest and the West Coast, where the companies may have to sell stations and refineries.

Regulators also will likely seek sales of some stations in Europe, where Mobil is already involved in a joint venture with British Petroleum, analysts said.

The companies have about 47,000 gas stations worldwide, roughly a third in the United States. They could also be forced to trim their strong businesses in motor oil and other lubricants. A merger proposal reportedly was to be presented to the companies' boards as early as Today. Karen Steffaro, a spokeswoman for Irving, Texas-based Exxon, yesterday said only that talks were continuing. A spokesman for Fairfax, Va.-based Mobil did not return a call seeking comment.

Reno holds off counsel investigation on White House top aide, Ickes

By Michael J. Sniffen
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Janet Reno postponed a decision yesterday on whether an independent counsel should investigate a former top White House aide who is accused of lying about aid for a union that contributed to Democrats.

Reno obtained approval from a special court for up to 60 more days to review the case of former White House deputy chief of staff Harold Ickes.

The court found she had "shown good cause for the requested extension," but Reno's reasons were not made public. She asked the court to seal the document explaining her need for more time, according to people familiar with the case.

Reno met during the day with aides who were divided on how she should handle the allegation that Ickes committed perjury before a Senate committee about the administration's efforts on behalf of the Teamsters Union in a 1995 strike against Diamond Walnut Co. Aides were advocating each of three options: ordering a counsel investigation, rejecting that ides, or asking a special court for 60 more days to look into the question.

The FBI, for instance, was recommending, as it has for more than a year, that the case — indeed the entire campaign finance investigation — be handed to an outside prosecutor, officials said. The Justice Department has spent 90 days in a preliminary inquiry on the Ickes matter and had to advise the special court, which selects counsels, by yesterday whether Reno wanted to order the eighth independent counsel of her tenure to look into a top Clinton administration figure.

"There should be an explanation for a request for 60 additional days," complained Senate Judiciary Committee member Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) who said Reno "delays and delays and delays...Long ago, Attorney General Reno should have appointed independent counsel in a broad way on campaign finance issues."

Republicans have pressed her repeatedly to relinquish control of the campaign finance investigation, but for two years she has refused to take it from her campaign finance task force. That group of 120 prosecutors and agents has charged 14 people, including some prominent Democratic contributors.

Ickes has denied any wrongdoing in the matter, which stems from one question he was asked during the third day of a private deposition he gave the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee on Sept. 22, 1997.

In 1995, Ickes met with Teamsters leaders about the Diamond Walnut strike. An administration memo prepared for him noted that the union had given $2.4 million for Democratic candidates in 1992 and suggested that the party should consider helping the Teamsters on key issues, like the strike, if it wanted to continue to receive that support.

Ickes was closely involved in managing President Clinton's 1996 re-election fund raising.

The Senate panel, which was investigating campaign finance practices, asked: "What did the administration do regarding the Diamond Walnut strike?"

Ickes responded: "Nothing that I know of."

There were no follow-up questions on the subject.

According to a Teamsters memo obtained by the committee, Ickes said he asked then-U.S. Trade Representative Mickey Kantor if he would urge Diamond Walnut to settle its dispute with the union. Ickes has acknowledged asking Kantor to make a phone call. Kantor subsequently called the company's chief. He has said the call was not motivated by fund raising and that the administration never acted to punish the company on behalf of the Teamsters. Kantor said he merely asked the status of a possible settlement and applied no pressure.

A company executive testified there was no explicit threat but the call was viewed at Diamond Walnut as part of the Teamsters' effort.

Two new releases from KMFDM are sure to please

By Kevin Monahan

RETRO
KMFDM
Wax Trax/TVT

Since their conception in 1984, German band KMFDM has been a welcome addition to the industrial genre. Their first LP, 1986's What Do You Know, Deutschland? established them as a fresh, new and innovative sound that would endure for years to come. Now, two new releases from KMFDM (which, despite rumors, is an acronym for Kein Mehrheit Für Die Mitleid, which loosely translated means "No pity for the majority") display the funky, industrial sound that the band has crafted for themselves. Retro, is a "best of" collection, featuring most, if not all, of KMFDM's best tunes, and Agogo, a rare and previously unreleased compilation.

Both Retro and Agogo are typical KMFDM album titles (one word, five letters.) Retro covers material from the albums Don't Blow Your Top, What Do You Know, Deutschland?, Naive/Hell to Go, Money, Angst, Nihil, and Xtort. The cover art for Retro consists of thumbnail pictures of the covers of these albums as designed by Brute!, which most KMFDM fans already own. There is nothing on Retro that can't be found anywhere else and there might be some feuding over what KMFDM's "best" might be. Some songs included here may not be the band's greatest, and some of their better material is not included ("Sex on the Flag," "Help Us, Save Us, Take Us Away," etc.). Despite this, Retro is a comprehensive study of KMFDM's progression from album to album. Originally released in 1996 as a promo-only CD, Retro pre-dates 1997's 5 symbols album, but has not been available for sale until now. Opening up with "Power," from 1996's Xtort, the disc proceeds in reverse chronological order. "Juke-Joint Jezebel" from 1995's Nihil (also featured on the Mortal Kombat soundtrack) is without a doubt one of KMFDM's best tunes. Featuring 15 tracks, other tracks include "A Drug Against War," "Light," "Money," "Godlike–Doglike," "Rip the System," and "Don't Blow Your Top."

Agogo, unlike Retro, is filled with stuff that is unavailable anywhere else, or very hard to find. Previously unreleased songs such as "Thank You" (originally to be released on Money, but never made the final cut), "Hole in the Wall," "Agogo" and "Zip" are musts for any KMFDM fan. As is "Godlike" and "Virus-Dub" which are from the 1990 pressing of Naïve, which, due to copyright laws, was forced out of print. It was later remixed and repackaged under the title Naive/Hell to Go. "Rip the System" (different from the version on Laibe) and "Naff Off" are from the out of print "More and Faster" 12 inch single. But what makes Agogo a real treat is KMFDM's cover of U2's "Mysterious Ways" sung by drummer En Esch. "Ooh La La," from the Hellraiser III soundtrack, is also included.

While Retro has nothing to offer the longtime KMFDM fan, it is a great resource for those with a peaking interest in the German funk/industrial/electronica outfit. Retro neatly packages KMFDM's unique sound. KMFDM is a band that truly sounds different from anyone else, and Retro proves it. Agogo, however, is what every KMFDM fan is waiting for. Old material that we thought we'd never hear and a few surprises as well, Agogo is a more than welcome release in the flood of "best of" and live albums being released lately. Also, watch out for Adios, the next LP to be released early next year. RETRO: B. AGOGO: A

Chinese filmmaker to speak at UM

By Will Thomsun
Collegian Correspondent

One of China's prominent filmmakers will be coming to the University of Massachusetts to talk about his work tomorrow.

Zhou Xiaowen, and his creative producer, Jimmy Tan will be at UMass to speak about Chinese film and their experience making movies in China.

In preparation for their arrival, three films directed by Xiaowen and one new film produced by Tan will be screened in a three-day tribute to their work.

Xiaowen is one of the new generation of young directors known for striking a balance between artistic goals and the realities of making films under the restrictions and censorship in mainland China.

All movies are free and the series began yesterday with the movie "Ermo." "The Emperor's Shadow" will be shown at 6 p.m. tonight followed by "Black Mountain" at 8 p.m. At 8 p.m. on Wednesday "East Palace, West Palace," directed by Zhang Yuan and produced by Tan, will be screened. All movies will be shown in Thompson Hall 104. On Wednesday, the discussion with Zhou will take place in the Campus Center 162-175 at 4:30 p.m.

"Ermo" is set in a remote village in China, but this movie does not idealize or romanticize peasant life. The movie is a comedy that pokes fun at rural China's backwardness but also skewers the empty consumerism that typifies modern life.

Ermo is the main character, jealous of her neighbor for having the first television in the village. She watches her son tromp to the neighbor's house every evening and decides to one-up them by buying an even larger television set. She works day and night hawking noodles and giving blood to save up for the price of the largest television in the county.

"The Emperor's Shadow" is a film about artistic freedom and propaganda. Set in the Qin Dynasty, two childhood friends meet years later. One has become the most ruthless Emperor in China's history, the other has become a celebrated musician. The Emperor captures his former friend and offers to let him write an ode celebrating the Emperor's rule in exchange for his life. The artist refuses and the Emperor tries to convince him to write it.

"East Palace, West Palace," is one of the first mainland Chinese movies to deal directly with gay life in China. A cop arrests a writer he finds cruising the bathrooms behind the Forbidden City, in Beijing. The policeman takes him back to the station where he interrogates him through the night. The writer manipulates his powerless position to break the officer's shell and try to seduce him.

In defense of his lifestyle, the writer says to the policeman, "I can be whatever I want...but who knows? You could be dead." The indictment is not only of this one officer, but of all oppressive authority. Artistic freedom in China is in a similarly powerless position, under the control of the government, yet it too remains seductive and active.

"East Palace, West Palace" is banned in China, but was smuggled out and debuted this year at Cannes.

The series is being sponsored by The Five College East Asian Language Program, The Five College Lecture Fund, University of Massachusetts Asian Studies Center, Mount Holyoke College and Smith College and is coordinated by Asian Language and Literature professor, Yaohua Shi.

The "Booya-base" Showcase

Pay close attention to the following words--

This Friday night, Dec. 4, is the first of a series of attempts to "rectify the Pioneer Valley from its recialness." The event is called the B-Boy Bouillabaisse (pronounced booya-base) and it will surely be a historical evening for area hip-hop. The festivities, which can be thought of as a cultural awareness seminar, kick off at 9 p.m. sharp in the belly of Northampton's Club Metro. None other than the Godfather Kool Here, the acknowledged father of rap music, will host the show and spin a full set of classic 'old school' jams. Massachusetts will be well-represented as several Boston-based talents will showcase their skills. Nationally known duo DJ 7L and Esoteric, who are down with Bahamadia's crew Army of the Pharoahs, lead a tight selection of Beantown's bona fide phenomenons of the underground. Performing will be: Akrobatik, who is a self- produced MC and one of the east coast's most unheralded artists; Mr. Lif, the verbal-speed-drum, who has recently signed to Indy label Brick Records and Virtuoso, known for victimizing his opponents with a relentless gift of gab. Check for Akrobatik's single "Ruff Enuff" and Virtuoso's "Incinerator" all week on 91.1 WMUA. Also appearing will be Octagon Supreme and Vandguard, a.k.a. Kool Reef, who will bring a slick mesh of styles to the stage.

The night will continue with a DJ battle where former DMC and ITF challengers, as well as daring local acts, will flex their routines. This segment will include a guest appearance from the Turntable Crash Dummies. Closing the event will be a set from highly touted turntablist DJ Do-- Boy, the ITF World Champion member of 5th Platoon, a squad that poses a serious threat to the X-Men and Invisible Scratch Pikilz. All in all, Club Metro will be the spot for rejuvenating, bone-shattering hip-hop.

Putting on the B-Boy Bouillabaisse is Illegal Alien Productions, which is a locally-formed, independent production/management company. Its founders, Cess Rock and Tone 1, are both UMass students who have spent years soaking up hip-hop culture. "Philosophizing and creating is what got us here," says Cess. Tone adds that Friday's fest will be "undoubtiably the hottest event of the year."

IAP (otherwise known as Drunk Monkz) emphasize that they will continue to bring forth all aspects of hip-hop, from house parties to shows like this one. In their arsenal are various graf artists, turntablists, journalists, emcees and B- boys. Their war strategist and head analyst is local legend George Gilmer, a.k.a. DJ Stress, who, along with the rest of the Drunk Monkz crew, will be in full representation on Friday night. Possible future plans for IAP include shows from well-known acts like Big Pun and the Terror Squad to the likes of Black Star and J-Live.

The event has also received tremendous support from Bueno Y Sano, whose owner Robert Lowery maintains that "hip-hop is a spiritual outlet and a means to 'uplift.'" So come show love and help demonstrate that the hip-hop community is unified, peaceful and fun-loving...like it was when Kool Herc ruled the streets.

Webber's fate set for a jury
Marijuana charges cap off long year

By Joseph White
Associated Press

UPPER MARLBORO, Md. (AP) — Sacramento Kings forward Chris Webber, charged with marijuana possession and assaulting a police officer, will have his fate decided by a jury after a judge yesterday denied a motion to enforce a purported plea bargain.

With jury selection to begin today, Prince George's County chief prosecutor Jack Johnson said he would ask for jail time if Webber is convicted.

Webber, who then played for the Washington Wizards, was arrested in his sports utility vehicle after being stopped for speeding while on the way to a practice Jan. 20.

Police say that when Webber refused to get out of his car after failing to produce a license or registration, he resisted the officer and was sprayed with pepper spray. The vehicle was impounded and police say they found traces of marijuana inside.

Yesterday, Webber's attorney, Steven Levy, asked Judge William Missouri to enforce a plea bargain that he said was offered by prosecutors and would have dropped the most serious charges. Johnson said that offer never was made and the judge denied the motion, saying there was "never a total meeting of the minds."

Earlier, Judge Hovey Johnson denied a motion to suppress evidence in the case. Levy argued the officer did not have "reasonable suspicions" to stop Webber's car, but the judge said he saw "nothing wrong with what the officer has done."

The trial caps a difficult year for Webber, who paid a fine in May after marijuana was found in his carry-on bag at an airport in San Juan, Puerto Rico. Shortly after, Fila canceled its multimillion-dollar endorsement contract with Webber.

Great 8 ready to play in Chicago

By Rick Gano
Associated Press

CHICAGO (AP) — Finally, familiar sounds at the United Center. Basketballs thudding off the floor, fast-moving sneakers making their inevitable screech, fans cheering dunks and 3-pointers and coaches hollering out instructions.

No, not those locked-out Bulls. It's the Great Eight back in town for two days.

"We'd be there even if the Bulls were playing, but with them out of action everybody is probably a little starved for basketball," Duke coach Mike Krzyzewski said of today and tomorrow's two-day showcase. "It might make for a better crowd." Krzyzewski's Blue Devils, knocked from No. 1 by Cincinnati in the final of the Great Alaska Shootout last weekend, play Michigan State Wednesday night in the fourth and final game.

The field is comprised of six of last season's final eight teams from the NCAA tournament and begins tonight with top-ranked Connecticut facing No. 15 Washington in a rematch of March's East Regional semifinal.

In today's nightcap, two of the traditional powers of college basketball, No. 7 Kansas and No. 8 Kentucky, meet for the first time since 1990.

Utah, ranked 21st, and unranked Rhode Island play in Wednesday's first game.

"Our game with Michigan State is a big-time game and we're fortunate to be playing it in December," said Krzyzewski, whose team has slipped to fourth. "It's important to be in that atmosphere. To be playing in these tournaments and having a tough non-conference schedule, that enhances your chances in postseason play. You can lose games and still learn."

Michigan State-Duke features a marquee matchup of point guards William Avery of the Blue Devils and Mateen Cleaves of the ninth-ranked Spartans. And strong play from the point should be in abundance with Connecticut's Khalid El-Amin, Utah's Andre Miller and Kentucky's Wayne Turner.

Connecticut defeated Washington 75-74 in the NCAA tournament eight months ago when Richard Hamilton hit a shot just before the final buzzer. Washington, with 7-foot center Todd MacCulloch and 6-4 guard Donald Watts, is 4-0 after winning the Big Island Invitational in Hawaii.

"Washington will give us an indication if we're a better team than last year," Connecticut coach Jim Calhoun said.

"It will be a great chance for us to win our first big test. It gives teams a chance to see where they are in the first part of December."

■ DiMaggio

Hollywood, Fla., had termed it a "serious setback" for DiMaggio, who remains in intensive care.

"He takes two steps forward and one back," Barron said. DiMaggio has had several setbacks since undergoing surgery Oct. 14 to remove a cancerous tumor from his right lung.

He had his lungs drained at least twice in October when they filled with fluid from an infection, and his longtime friend and lawyer Morris Engelberg said he feared for DiMaggio's life. On Nov. 16, DiMaggio's blood pressure dropped precipitously, prompting a Catholic priest to be summoned to give him the last rites.

He was improving last week, and was visited for his 84th birthday on Wednesday by relatives, including his brother Dom. On Thanksgiving Day, he was buoyed by a visit from his great grandaughters, Valerie, 9, and Vanessa, 11.

DiMaggio yesterday wanted the breathing tube in his throat removed so he could talk, Barron said.

"He was waving at me to take it out," Barron said, adding that he declined to remove it and told DiMaggio that a pulmonary specialist would make that decision.

ND's MacLeod faces rising temps in hoop hot seat

Note to John MacLeod: It's only going to get worse from here on out.

You can almost feel bad for MacLeod. As the men's basketball coach at Notre Dame, MacLeod has to wallow in frustration without any of the spotlight the Fightin' Irish's beloved football team gets.

Casey Kane on College Basketball

Most years that would be a negative. Not as many fans, not as much attention. This year, however, that may be a blessing in disguise.

Newsflash: Notre Dame is struggling. Big time. And if the Irish don't turn things around quickly, MacLeod will probably have to dust off his resume and spruce up his cover letters.

Consider that the Irish are working without Pat Garrity, the best player to go through the ND ranks recently. Consider that even with Garrity, Notre Dame could not win consistently and failed to reach the NCAA tournament.

Consider that guard Keith Friel, one of Notre Dame's best offensive punches, transferred to warmer climates, although not necessarily better basketball, at Virginia. Friel averaged 8.9 points per game last season and hit 46.4 percent of his shots from three-point range.

Consider that in last weekend's Great Alaska Shootout, the Irish lost to the host team, the University of Alaska–Anchorage, 88–82 in overtime.

And consider that UA-A is a Division II school.

Alaska–Anchorage gets in this tournament every year simply because the tournament is held in its gym. The nice folks up at UA-A figure this is their chance to say, "Hey, we got to see Cincinnati upset Duke this year," or "My, wasn't it nice for those fine insert team mascot here to kick the living crap out of us this year."

This year UA-A does deserve some credit. After all, the night before knocking off Notre Dame, Alaska–Anchorage came within a hair of upsetting Fresno State. Of course Jerry Tarkanian can only go seven deep because his players are either academically ineligible, in rehab or in protective custody.

Getting back to the issue at hand, Notre Dame does have some hope in its freshman class. MacLeod, to his credit, put together a solid recruiting year, grabbing 6-foot–10 forward Troy Murphy, who could eventually prove to be better than Garrity, and 6–6 forward David Graves, who was impressive going to the basket and on the perimeter in the Shootout.

Still, those recruits are only freshmen and it will take some time for them to get their feet wet. In the meantime, the temperature will be rising in MacLeod's hot seat.

• What a bad time to be a ranked team. Last week, 10 ranked teams suffered their first losses of the season, clearing the way for Connecticut to grab its first No.1 ranking in the Associated Press poll since Feb. 13, 1995.

To wrap up: Former No. 1 Duke fell to Cincy in Alaska, which puts the Blue Devils at No. 4 and the Bearcats in sixth; Maryland moves to No. 2 after winning the Puerto Rico Shootout Preseason NIT champ North Carolina takes third; and Stanford, the NIT runner-up, falls to fifth.

UConn won't have the easiest week as it tries to hold onto that No. 1 ranking. Tonight, the Huskies battle No. 15 Washington in the Great Eight and Saturday they host No. 9 Michigan State in Gampel Pavilion.

It will be interesting to see if UConn will be able to hold that top spot in the AP poll longer than it did in 1995. Less than a week after being tabbed No. 1, the Huskies fell to Villanova by 25 at home (ouch!).

• Speaking of the Blue Devils, this year the Duke student government has put some restrictions on those famous tent cities that have made "Krzyzewskiville" what it is today. Starting this year, students can not pitch tents in line for hoop tickets until 10 days before gameday.

The restriction on the tent cities is designed to cut down on population buildup outside Cameron Indoor Stadium. Last season, 1,500 students lined up six weeks in advance to get tickets to the Duke–UNC showdown.

Therefore, some freshmen have taken it upon themselves to be first in line without much protection from the elements — by camping out with just some sleeping bags and air mattresses.

Once that 10-day waiting period begins, there must be someone in each tent at all times. Starting 48 hours before each game, every single tent dweller must be in their makeshift home; student monitors check five random times before tipoff.

UMass looks to rebound from loss tonight against Charleston

By Aaran Saykin
Collegian Staff

One could say the Massachusetts men's basketball team fell victim to the notorious "Sports Illustrated jinx."

On the same day that the popular sports periodical predicted that the Minutemen were the ninth best team in the nation, UMass was upset by host St. John's 73–69 and prematurely eliminated from the Chase Pre-season NIT.

And now that coach Bruiser Flint's squad has had nearly two weeks to absorb the loss and iron out its kinks, the players hope they have learned a valuable lesson about underestimating their opponent — a lesson which will hopefully help them tonight in South Carolina, where they will battle a very underrated opponent in the form of the College of Charleston.

Make no mistake about this team. The Cougars compiled a 24–6 overall mark last season, which culminated with a trip to the NCAA Tournament, where they stayed close against the Final-Four Stanford team before losing by a mere 10 points. As favorites to run away with the Southern Conference title, the College of Charleston returns its top player from last season. Sedric Webber, a 6-foot–6 forward, averaged 15.1 points and 7.9 rebounds per contest in 1997–98. The program also boasts a lesser-known, but extremely respected head coach in John Kresse, who has compiled a dominant 465–118 record in his 19 years at the Charleston helm.

Although no member of the starting Cougar front court stands taller than 6-foot–8, Flint, who watched an undersized Red Storm squad out-rebound and out-muscle his team, believes that his players will take the floor with a more aggressive and inspired attitude.

"We got out-toughed and out-scrapped by a good St. John's team down there in their own building," Flint said. "We can't win basketball games [if we play] like that...it was just one of those games [when] we just got out-hustled and out-toughed, and lost the basketball game. I told my guys that we were going to go back and practice. We're not going to be getting out-toughed and out-hustled that much."

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Leaping legend and defensive specialist Mike Babul and the rest of the Massachusetts men's hoop squad will battle host College of Charleston tonight.

Among the several keys for a UMass victory will be consistent outside shooting from the back court. After watching the guards struggle from the perimeter against the Red Storm, Flint may opt to utilize his fiery sophomore shooting guard Rafael Cruz, who scored nine quick points and dished out two impressive assists during the waning moments of the defeat.

Senior center Lari Ketner, who was projected as the top NBA prospect in the Atlantic 10 Conference, will need to assert himself early against the Cougars. In the loss to St. John's, Ketner did not score until 15 minutes into the contest, nor did he and his front-court mate Ajmal Basit assert a rebounding presence beneath the basket — two problems which will likely be remedied with two weeks of practice.

"We've got two tough road games coming up at Charleston and Marshall, and we just have to prepare ourselves and get ready to go," said Flint, who also referred to his team's following game on Saturday.

Another concern for UMass will likely be the high-energy Cougar defense, which had twice as many steals as its opponent last season. A swarm of quicker, smaller Red Storm defenders managed to force Flint's team into 18 turnovers on Nov. 18.

"We must have had 10 or 11 balls knocked out of our hands [against St. John's]," Flint said of the defense.

One of the bright spots on the Minuteman roster thusfar has been junior forward Mike Babul. Although he has earned the reputation as the toughest defender in his conference, Babul surprisingly paced UMass offensively against St. John's, scoring a team-high 15 points while shutting down Ron Artest, the most potent Red Storm scorer.

"Mike Babul was outstanding in that game. He did a great job on Artest," Flint said of the North Attleboro native. "He played outstanding and he kept us in the game."

Bills still crying about their loss to the Pats

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

To the regret of the Buffalo Bills, the bottom line on NFL officiating is this: One official's pass interference is another's incomplete pass.

So while the Bills were still complaining yesterday about the interference call that gave New England one last chance to beat them Sunday, the league office was putting a human face on it. "I think all the officials are honest people. Honest people can make mistakes," said George Young, the NFL's senior vice president for football operations and a coach and administrator for 30 years with the Colts, Dolphins and Giants. "I know. I've been on both sides of it."

Don't tell that to the Bills, who lost in Foxboro following the end zone call on Drew Bledsoe's desperation pass as time ran out. The Patriots then scored the winning touchdown and an uncontested 2-point conversion.

The result dropped the Bills out of what would have been a three-way tie for first in the AFC East.

The Bills, from owner Ralph Wilson on down, insist there was no contact. And even if there was, it shouldn't have been called because both teams were shoving.

"I was supposed to be the jumper. I jumped," cornerback Thomas Smith said. "Everybody was jockeying for position back there. There is no way you can call that. I've been playing football a long time and I've never seen that."

That was John Madden's position two weeks ago, when the Cardinals appeared to be victimized after a pass interference wasn't called on the last play of their 35-28 loss to Dallas. Only that pass was a short fade pattern from Jake Plummer to Rob Moore. The Cardinals were as irate as the Bills were Sunday. But Madden, who was calling the game, said, "They never call that on the last play."

That defines the problem on a weekend when the officials were in the spotlight again — starting with the confusion on the coin flip to start the overtime in the Pittsburgh-Detroit game on Thanksgiving.

Some officials probably never call interference on the last play of the game, reasoning that one object of a desperation pass is to draw a foul. And league officials have never gotten a handle on how to standardize pass interference calls.

Last season, a crew headed by Bill Carollo, in his first year as a referee, allowed a lot of downfield bumping in a game in Philadelphia. The next week, in Kansas City, the officials seemed to be calling every hump.

No one will say, but the officials may have gotten a memo from headquarters.

The league tries. It sends NFL officials to NFL Europe each spring to gain more experience.

And every official is graded on every play, with the grades determining playoff assignments (although it would be an upset if Jerry Markbreit, who is retiring after 23 seasons, is not the referee in this season's Super Bowl.)

"There's accountability for officials on every call," says Young, who was co-chairman of the rule-making competition committee before joining the league office.

That may be true. But it will be no consolation to the Bills (or Steelers) if they fail to make the playoffs.

SPREAD DREAD

Depending on who was making the line, the Patriots were favored over the Bills by two to three and one-half points. The final TD gave New England a 23-21 lead, but the officials called the teams on the field for the extra point. Buffalo declined, so the Patriots lined up against no one, and kicker Adam Vinatieri ran in for two points to make the final 25-21.

The league doesn't know (nor does it acknowledge) how many bettors were upset.

HISTORY CALLS

John Elway threw three interceptions and fumbled once. Terrell Davis was held to 74 yards on 24 carries. And still Denver won 31-16 in San Diego, becoming just the fourth NFL team to start 12-0. The others were the 1985 Bears, the 1972 Dolphins and the 1934 Bears.

The Bears of 13 years ago stopped right there — they were beaten 38-24 in a Monday night game in Miami, where the Dolphins were inspired by members of the 1972 team, the last one to finish a season unbeaten.

Next Sunday, the Broncos are at home for the Chiefs, whom they beat 30-7 at Arrowhead two weeks ago. Chiefs-Broncos is always an intense game and it will be more intense this time because of the wrangling on the late drive in Kansas City, when five unsportsmanlike conduct penalties were called on the Chiefs. Then Denver visits the Giants, who are going nowhere, followed by what would be the game of the year, a meeting in Miami with the Dolphins.

That will be just the second meeting between Elway and Dan Marino, the two superstars of the quarterback class of 1983. Marino won the first time, in Denver in 1985.

Another sidelight: Brian Griese, Denver's rookie third-string quarterback is the son of Bob Griese, the quarterback for that Miami team and now ABC's first-string college football analyst. How strong are the emotions of those old Dolphins?

"No question," Bob Griese said last week. "I'll be with Miami."

Yes, but what if Brian were Denver's starter?

Big Unit lands lucrative deal in Arizona

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

Randy Johnson, the most accomplished pitcher among this year's free agents, agreed yesterday to a $53 million, four-year contract with the Arizona Diamondbacks, The Associated Press has learned. Johnson, a left-hander who causes so much fear among some left-handed hitters that they take themselves out of games he pitches, also had been considering offers from the Anaheim Angels, Los Angeles Dodgers and Texas Rangers.

While there was no immediate announcement of the deal, it was confirmed to the Associated Press by a source familiar with the negotiations who spoke on the condition he not be identified. The Diamondbacks planned to announce it late last night, the source said.

By signing with Arizona, Johnson will be able to commute to half his games each season. He lives in Glendale, a comfortable driving distance from Bank One Ballpark in Phoenix.

"For us, it's obvious there are family issues, and he's pleased to spend his life in the Valley for hopefully the rest of his baseball life," Johnson's agent, Barry Meister, told radio station KMVP in Phoenix. "But also from the top, we have a commitment that the Diamondbacks are going to do what it takes to get to the World Series and we believe that."

The average annual value of his new contract is $13.25 million, the second-highest in baseball behind the $13.33 million Mo Vaughn will get under the $80 million, six-year contract he agreed to Wednesday with Anaheim.

Johnson, 35, was 10-1 with a 1.28 ERA and 116 strikeouts in 84 1/3 innings this year for the Houston Astros, who acquired him from Seattle on July 31. Unhappy with the Mariners after they refused to give him a contract extension after the 1997 season, Johnson had asked for a trade.

When Seattle refused, he was grumpy all through spring training and the first half of the season, going 9-10 with a 4.33 ERA before Seattle dealt him just minutes before the trade deadline.

Houston had hoped to re-sign him but dropped out of the bidding Tuesday after becoming convinced it would take a four-year contract to keep Johnson.

Joltin' Joe still fighting illness

By Marv Schneider
Associated Press

Joe DiMaggio had another "serious setback" in his slow recovery from lung cancer surgery — an infection that doctors believe they had brought under control yesterday.

The 84-year-old Hall of Famer developed the lung infection on Friday, but after a weekend of intensive treatment, his temperature and white blood cell count were back to normal yesterday morning, said Dr. Earl Barron.

"We have every hope that he will survive, but anything can happen," Barron told The Associated Press. "Considering his age, it's going to be a long road back for him."

Jets set for AFC East crown; Mets make big mistake

Buckle your belts, and batten down the hatches, because after twelve weeks of play in the NFL, the New York Jets stand atop the best division in football. OK, so they are only tied for first with Marino's marinated fish, but at 8–4 who am I to complain?

My condolences to Kevin Greene

Sanford Appell goes

Armpit [illegible]

who was absolutely flattened like one of those jumbo pancakes at Bickford's by Keith Byars. Next time the train is coming, get out of the way of the way Kevin...

For once in my life, I cannot knock the Patriots or the creampuff quarterbacking the team, because his two straight game-winning drives were nothing short of miraculous... even if Shawn Jefferson was clearly out of bounds on 4th and 9, last Sunday.

Isn't it quite convenient for UConn that they didn't have to defeat anyone more competitive than Wagner to "earn" the number one ranking in the country?

The frisky Huskies will take on No. 14 Washington tonight, and if they manage to stay atop the heap until December 9, look for UMass to stun the over-confident Storrs dwellers.

However, the key to that contest, and many others this season for the Minutemen, may be in the hands of sophomore guard Rafael Cruz.

For those of you who either have not heard of him or just think I'm clinical, consider this: having traveled to Jamaica, N.Y., and having witnessed the heartbreaking four-point loss to St. John's, I saw Raf nail three straight three pointers, force two turnovers on defense, and dish out two assists in nine minutes of play!

While there are many talented players on this year's squad, few can match the intensity level Raf reaches, so let's collectively hope to see a lot more of him in the near future.

Perhaps the most courageous and focused team this campus has seen this decade may be this year's football unit, which went down to the Bayou last Saturday and knocked off favored McNeese State in a first-round playoff game without their biggest weapon.

Marcel Shipp, who has rushed for nine straight 100-yard games, was replaced by freshman Kevin Quinlan who performed to raving reviews in guiding UMass to their 21–19 stunning upset.

It is imperative that the student body rally behind its bunch of winners this weekend against Lehigh in the second round.

Moving on to the diamond, it is hard not to sympathize with the downtrodden and desperate Red Sox, who apparently have really struck out this time. It seemed like a parting of ways between the club and Mo Vaughn may have been necessary at this juncture, and Bernie Williams may have been the most suitable replacement for Vaughn's lethal power injection in the lineup.

While Williams is clearly not the superstar he claims to be, his quiet demeanor and business first approach may have been a perfect fit for Beantown.

But it now seems as though Williams had his sights set on a return to the Big Apple all along. It is inexcusable for Dan Duquette and company to have let Albert Belle slip through the cracks as well.

While his take on life and the game may have clashed entirely with the atmosphere at Fenway Park, one cannot overlook a man with the potential to hit 50 home runs and drive in 150 runs in the foreseeable future.

Moving over to the more traditional National League, look for the Los Angeles Dodgers to once again reign supreme, now that they have the best manager in baseball in their clubhouse.

Davey Johnson will bring the boys in blue to the promised land within two years, especially if they steal Todd Hundley from the Mets for Todd Hollandsworth.

After a potential Todd for Todd swap, LA's next move would be to move overrated catcher Charles Johnson for some more relief pitching. Lord knows that they need it with Mel Rojas taking up space in their pen.

As for Rojas' former employers, the Mets apparently lost all of their senses when alleviating themselves of his services. Bringing Bobby Bonilla back may be the single worst move in franchise history, up there with trading Nolan Ryan way back when.

Bonilla is not only the biggest headache the franchise has ever known, but at this point in his career he is no better than a .260 hitter, and is even more deadly once he puts the glove on, where he is good for at least 20 errors a season.

For fellow NBA fanatics, don't look now but the 1998–99 season is going, going...

Aid accord shows U.S. ambivalence

CARTAGENA, Colombia (AP) — Convinced of the need to strengthen an armed forces under siege by the hemisphere's most powerful insurgency, the United States signed an accord with Colombia yesterday pledging more military support.

But the modest agreement — creating a bilateral working group to discuss U.S. military aid options — seemed as much a symbol of American reluctance as enthusiasm about getting more deeply involved in Colombia's nearly 4-decade-old conflict.

The group will convene twice a year with the aim of making Colmbia's armed forces more professional, improving human rights and fighting drug trafficking, officials said.

U.S. Defense Secretary William Cohen, in Colombia for a meeting of regional defense ministers, called the accord an "important step" that could lead to more tangible assistance in the future. Cohen and Rodrigo Lloreda, the Colombian defense minister, discussed U.S. training and equipment for a 1,000-man army battalion expected to be established by mid-1999. The unit's sole function will be to assist police in anti-narcotics operations.

Boeing to slash up to 48,000 jobs by 2000

SEATTLE (AP) — Boeing Co. will cut as many as 48,000 jobs over the next two years as the company scales back production of several commercial jet lines, company officials said.

Boeing blamed the cutbacks on the continuing Asian crisis. "Clearly, the economic slowdown in Asia is driving air traffic down which impacts our customers' plans and operations," said Alan Mulally, Boeing Commercial Airplane Group president. "Our actions today will match production to market demand to support our customers."

Boeing said it would reduce employment from its high of 238,000 people in June by as many as 38,000 by the end of 1999 and another 10,000 in 2000. The figures include the 28,000 jobs that the company earlier said it planned to cut by the end of 1999. The cuts would amount to a 20 percent reduction in Boeing's work force from a June 1998 high of 238,000.

Boeing, which early had projected 1999 net earnings at about $2 billion, now said it was forecasting next year's profits at $1.5 billion to $1.8 billion. It said 1998 profits were expected to be slightly above $1 billion, as earlier forecast.

The company said it would reduce production of 747 jetliners from 3.5 to two airplanes per month late next year, and to just one per month in early 2000 if market conditions fail to improve.

Amherst bar owners still smoking because of ban; enforcement too difficult

By Rachel Uranga
Collegian Staff

The smoking ban in Amherst bars continue, though enforcement is lax according to Orlando Sola–Gomez, member of Board of Health of Amherst.

Last night, the board voted against ventilation variances. The variance would have allowed smoking in bars if the establishment offered proper ventilation. The criteria for proper ventilation would be determined by the Board of Health of Amherst.

Sola–Gomez, along with board member Valerie Steinberg, defeated the proposal with a 2–1 vote. There were two non– voting members, board member Amy Rothenberg who abstained and Marisela Latimier who was absent.

The contentious issue drew several concerned Amherst bar owners to the meeting.

Though the issue to be discussed was variance, it quickly moved to the smoking ban. Several bar owners urged the board to grant a variance as a relief to the economic devastation the smoking ban has caused their business.

"We lost 30 percent of our business. My house is for sale," said Eugene O'Neill owner of Olde Amherst Ale House.

The bar had their food–service licenses suspended for violating the smoking ban last month. "There is not a bar in town that is in full compliance. It is not enforceable," he said.

Enforcement of the ban, which was established in 1994 but did not take effect until this July, has been a sticking point with the owner of Charlie's, Richard Slobody.

The board, he said, should either "repeal or enforce" the ban and "level the playing field."

Slobody said, his "business fell off tremendously during July and August," estimating a 20 percent dropoff in patronage since the smoking ban took effect this summer.

Director of the Board of Health of Amherst Edi Bodhi, said there is a "real attempt by all establishments to comply with varying results," though she said she has only anecdotal evidence to support her statement. Bodhi said after going around to "about five" bars since Nov. 19 she observed smoking in one establishment. This fact is disputed by several bar owners.

Within the area, Amherst is the only town to have a regulation affecting all bars. Surrounding towns do not have such blanket ordinances.

"We can't do it town by town. I would have supported it had it been region-wide," said Carolyn Holstein, a town meeting member who works at the psychology department at UMass. "I am kind of urging you to reconsider your policy. People are going to cheat. They are addicted."

In the same vein, Rafter's owner, Gerald Jolly said "granting a variance would be a practical thing to do and then wait for the state."

But the state has made no indication that it will move on the issue.

Other cities and institutions, like the Holyoke Health Department, are looking to Amherst on this issue, explained member David Buchanan who motioned for the ventilation variance at last night's meeting.

"Economics," he said, "are the only reason we have dithered on the issue."

A variance remains a possibility, either through a town meeting or a referendum on the April ballot.

Sola–Gomez encourages taking the issue to a town meeting. Meanwhile, he fears the Select Board will not enforce the ban and said they "are not doing their job."

Sola–Gomez said finances have preempted health concerns. "There are a lot of young people at the university... who are going to pick up this habit."

Earlier last month several bars, including The Spoke and Delano's, had weekend suspensions on their food–handling permits after refusing to comply with the ban. Other bars not in compliance were fined.

According to Bodhi, pre–trial will begin Thursday for "four or five" criminal complaints filed by the board against those bars failing to pay fines.

Director to speak about new college

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

Dr. Linda Nolan, Director of the Honors program will speak about the new Commonwealth College tonight Field Classroom in Orchard Hill Residential Area. The presentation will begin at 6 p.m.

Mohammed Reza, governor of Orchard Hill Area government, invited Nolan to speak.

"I want Orchard Hill residents to know what's happening with the new honors college and just be aware of what's going on," said Reza.

Reza said he feels something as important as building the Commonwealth College should be more publicized.

"The main reason for doing this is they didn't get enough students input. I've talked to some students who weren't for it. I want to level where we're really going with this," he said.

Reza added that separating those students with higher GPAs will ultimately divide the community.

"It's like all the smart kids will be living up on a hill and everyone else is living down below. I'm [a residential assistant] in Field and having just freshmen in the hall will change the entire culture," he said.

Reza said separating students based on their grades also is an issue of classism.

"The students living up there with the best GPAs will probably come from much better socio–economic backgrounds than the rest of campus," he said.

"When you come from a good high school and have taken AP classes, you're more prepared and will have a better GPA. It will have a big effect on this university."

According to Reza, Nolan has said the changes in the residence halls will not be as drastic as some are saying. But, he said he wants more students involved in the process not just, "a few people doing what they think is right."

"Not even the ARD's here know what's going on," said Reza.

"Once you start poking around asking questions, then they start talking to you," he said.

"A letter should be given to University students explaining what is going on. They're using student resources so the rest of the university should know what's going on."

Also speaking will be Art Keene, also involved with the planning of the Commonwealth College. Reza said Nolan and Keene will discuss how the new honors college will differ from the existing one, and how the changes will affect residents of Orchard Hill.

Clock anomaly confuses some UMass students

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts chapel has been temporarily restored but some students aren't counting on an end to its renovation as they point out that the problem is all a matter of time.

Towering over campus on the front face of the chapel clock, number four, commonly represented by the roman numeral "IV" is written as "IIII" instead. Charles Sturtevant, a senior electrical engineering major, was not aware of the clock's restored symbols.

"It's weird because I walked by the chapel earlier, and I hadn't noticed it," Sturtevant said. "I think it's pretty funny. But if it's been like that for years, they should just let it be."

According to Ken Jodrie, head architect on the chapel reconstruction project, the numeral form was included in the original construction plans.

"If a person were to research it, they would find it is not unusual to represent roman numerals in different forms," Jodrie said. "For example, the roman numeral 'IX' can be represented as 'VIIII'."

While the original designers chose to represent the number four as IIII, nine is designated with the roman numeral "IX," Jodrie, however, feels that there is no need for any kind of confusion.

"Any numerical system would work because even if someone isn't familiar with the arrangement of the symbols, what they stand for individually are recognized universally to be self–explanatory," Jodrie said. "It was standard practice back then."

Jodrie feels the restoration has been a success, and the need to re-access its structure went beyond delaying the construction.

"The tower was literally falling apart; we have worked on this project for more than a year," Jodrie said. "The chapel will now serve as an assembly place as it always had in the past."

A study was done in the beginning to assess the focus of the project and consultants were hired to examine the strength in the brick mortar. Due to corrosion and old age, the cemented brick had grown weak to the point of collapsing.

The improved and renovated chapel is reinforced with a concrete/steel backing to provide increased support and durability.

Still, some students like Brent Williams, a senior electrical engineering major, have some unanswered questions.

"I really don't see why the architects would chose to represent the number as they did, but then again, why should I be surprised," Williams said.

"It seems like there's always been a university tradition of [for example] building libraries that pop-out bricks."

Clinton pledges to help orphans with AIDS

By Sonya Ross
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Citing new drugs and research that have fostered hope "we can actually defeat AIDS," President Clinton pledged yesterday to extend assistance to poor nations struggling to fight the disease and provide for the children of its victims. Clinton announced $10 million in grants for the care of AIDS orphans and said he would send his AIDS policy adviser to Africa to study the problem.

He also said $164 million that is already in the current federal budget would be devoted to AIDS prevention and treatment internationally and that another $200 million would pay for research on a vaccine. And Vice President Al Gore announced $200 million in housing assistance for AIDS patients and their families. The orphan grants will be used to provide training for foster families, schooling for orphans, vocational training and other assistance.

"We cannot forget our profound obligation to the heartbreaking youngest victims of the disease," Clinton said. "Sick or well, too many are left without parents to protect them, to teach them right from wrong, to guide them through life... We cannot restore to them all they have lost, but we can give them a future."

Yesterday's announcement came as AIDS organizations criticized Clinton for not doing enough to slow the spread of the disease both abroad and at home. Aside from research dollars, Clinton's administration has failed in areas such as needle exchange programs and prevention and education efforts among U.S. minorities, whose HIV infection rates are going up, they said.

"As America reaps the rewards of our investments in research and care, we're witnessing skyrocketing infection rates and an AIDS holocaust in Africa because of our failure to address prevention and international efforts," said Daniel Zingale, executive director of AIDS Action, an umbrella group of community-based organizations.

Clinton made his announcements in a White House ceremony commemorating World AIDS Day. He was joined by Amy Slemmer of Washington, D.C., who took in the eight-year-old daughter of her friend Carla after she died of AIDS.

"Many mothers around the world search for that sense of peace, just like Carla, and never find it," Slemmer said. "Mothers are crying out that the coming generation is in jeopardy. Being left alive should not mean being left alone."

Clinton noted that the U.S. investment in AIDS research has risen to $1.8 billion, the highest level ever, and that fewer Americans are dying of AIDS. "For the first time, therefore, there is hope that we can actually defeat AIDS," he said.

But at the same time, Clinton said, there is fresh evidence that the battle against AIDS is far from over. There are disproportionately high rates of infection among young people and minorities, a crying need among American AIDS sufferers for adequate housing, and a tragically escalating number of AIDS cases in countries such as Zimbabwe, he said.

Helicopter rescues a three–man TV crew trapped on Arctic island

By Anna Dolgov
Associated Press

MOSCOW — While snow squalls whipped across the desolate Arctic landscape, a Russian helicopter emerged from the dusky winter light yesterday and rescued a TV crew that had been stranded on a remote island for weeks by bad weather.

The three-man crew — a Russian, a Japanese and an Australian who had been making a documentary on polar bears — had three days' food left when the helicopter airlifted them from Wrangel Island to the port of Pevek, the Ministry of Emergency Situations said.

They had waited for weeks for the skies to clear up enough so that a helicopter could land. The temperature on Wrangel Island has been around minus 22 degrees, and the Arctic days never get brighter than twilight.

"We were filming polar bears and other animals," Nikita Ovsyannikov told Russian television channel NTV. "On Oct. 15, we completed the work, and a flight was ordered to take us back.

"But this year the weather conditions were very unusual: heavy, long cyclones, the weather was constantly bad, with powerful blizzards. So the flight couldn't arrive," he said.

The three then holed up in a cabin on the island's northeast coast, about 350 miles west of Alaska.

Japanese crew member Tatsuhiko Kobayashi developed complications from a recent eye operation, but the others were in good health, Russia's ORT television reported.

Weather in Russia's Arctic has been particularly severe this year. A nuclear-powered ice-breaking ship was stranded for several days last week, unable to cut a channel for a Finnish tanker that carried badly needed fuel to residents of Russia's northeast Chukotka peninsula, not far from Wrangel Island.

"It wasn't easy to find pilots," said Dean Finlay of the emergency company AEA International SOS. "Also, there was only a three-hour daytime window in the area, and just over two hours of flight time, so they had to get the window just right."

It took the crew about an hour to load the 880 pounds of equipment and film aboard. Then they traveled back in the already black Arctic night.

"It was an anxious couple of hours," said John Hyde, a television producer who helped coordinate the rescue.

Honduras lowers Mitch death toll

By Julie Watson
Associated Press

TEGUCIGALPA, Honduras — Honduras announced yesterday that it suspended a governor for inflating her region's death toll from Hurricane Mitch. It also lowered its official death count by 1,350 people.

The new death toll of 5,657 was compiled after the government sent teams to verify reports from regions across Honduras, the Interior Secretariat said yesterday.

The governor, Lucila Esperanza Barahona de Castro of the Santa Barbara region in remote Northwestern Honduras, was suspended after investigators could verify only 282 of the 1,159 deaths reported in her area.

Authorities said the suspension was standard procedure during an inquiry.

Barahona told The Associated Press she couldn't have falsified the numbers because she didn't even give a death toll to the federal government.

"I don't know what source gave them the numbers," she said yesterday.

In addition to the 5,657 dead, Honduras said it had verified 8,058 missing, 12,272 injured and 1.4 million homeless throughout the country.

Aid workers and journalists began questioning Honduras' estimated death toll after figures jumped drastically Nov. 2, two days after news broke of a landslide in Nicaragua that covered two villages and killed up to 2,000 people.

Textbook Annex - Textbook Buyback - December 1998

Beware of buyers in your dorm!

The Textbook Annex buyback is not associated with people who buy textbooks inside your dorms. You will not get the best prices possible from them. They do not buy any books at 50% of the Publisher's Retail Price. The Annex does. In fact, some of these people bring your books to the buyback to sell them at the higher price even though they have paid you a lower price.

Maximize your return by coming to the authorized locations in the Campus Center Room 162, Hampden in Southwest and the Textbook Annex.

How are buyback prices determined?

Buyback prices are determined by whether or not an instructor has submitted a book list for the next semester.

The Textbook Annex staff spends a lot of time trying to get this information because we know that the best source of those books are from those of you who are already using them. Around mid-terms our staff begins to encourage faculty to place their next orders through a variety of methods including a personal visit to each academic department, letters, flyers and phone calls. We want to give our customers the money that we would otherwise pay a used book wholesaler for used books. To maximize the half price list, we enter faculty's book orders into the buyback data base on the day we receive them.

If we know what books are needed, then the Textbook Annex will pay 50% of the Publisher's List Price, even if the book was purchased used. You will receive the wholesaler's predetermined current market price (wholesale price) if we do not have an order at the time you try to sell your book. You will receive wholesale prices because the Textbook Annex is not trying to add that book to our inventory. The prices they pay depend primarily on the national demand for the book. Wholesale buyback prices can range from 0 to 35%.

Ask Questions!

You should always take a minute to ask the buyers if your book is being purchased for the Annex to reuse or if you are being offered a wholesale price. You may not like the wholesale price but at least you'll understand what you are being offered.

Christmas is coming to Cuba

By John Rice
Associated Press

HAVANA — Christmas is coming to Cuba this holiday — officially, that is.

The Communist Party used the entire front page of Cuba's only daily newspaper, Granma, to recommend yesterday that "from this year on" Dec. 25 be a permanent holiday in Cuba. Adoption by the Communist government is assured.

Ordinary Cubans — whether religious or not — welcomed the news, which re-establishes a custom the communist government abolished in 1969.

"It makes me very happy," said Marta Soler, a secretary who came to the Our Lady of Carmen church to buy nativity figurines. "It's another day to rest... You can share it with the family," said Judith Arango Rodriguez, 26.

Cuba's Roman Catholic Church issued a statement declaring it "highly values this gesture" and expressing confidence that "the path of opening of Cuba" would lead to "causes for joy, unity and hope for the Cuban people."

It said re-establishing the holiday was "an act which does justice to our Christian-based culture." It also came after to a request by Pope John Paul II, who visited Cuba in January. The government granted a Christmas holiday last year as a one-time favor to the pope, but it had balked at declaring the measure permanent.

Despite increasing tensions between Cuban churches and a government that declared itself atheist in 1962, Christmas remained an official holiday in Cuba until 1969, when the government was frantically throwing much of the country's resources into an unsuccessful effort to harvest 10 million metric tons of sugar. The government argued that holidays interfered with the harvest and also canceled the New Year's holiday that year. The New Year's holiday soon returned, but Christmas remained a day of work. Yesterday the Communist Party said mechanization had reduced the need for manpower in the sugar harvest.

In its declaration, the party insisted that the abolition of the holiday in 1969 "was not inspired by any anti-religious sentiment" and argued that the Cuban revolution had been far easier on churches than revolutions in France, Russia and Mexico. However, the government at the time was avowedly atheist and often clashed with the Catholic hierarchy.

Christians were barred from being members of the Communist Party and from holding many sensitive jobs. Even followers of Afro-Cuban religions were considered unreliable, according to official documents.

Displaying a Christmas tree at that time could lead to conflicts with neighborhood Communist Party officials.

In 1976, Cuba's constitution guaranteed freedom of religion and in 1991, the Communist Party dropped its ban on religious believers. A year later, Cuba declared itself a secular rather than an atheist state.

Restrictions on believers have fallen away and church-state relations have grown steadily warmer, capped by the papal visit. This year, even state stores were selling plastic Christmas trees and ornaments.

Yesterday's declaration "is a signal of an opening, a rapprochement or reconciliation with the churches," said Josue Ladron de Guevara, 27, a Methodist minister from the eastern city of Santiago who was attending a religious workshop in Havana. "This is a dream that we have had for a long time," he added.

In its statement, the party praised churches for condemning the U.S. embargo of Cuba, for sending aid and for speaking out in favor of social justice around the world.

But it also alluded to old frictions, saying that "counterrevolutionaries" had long tried to create "divisions and conflicts between religion and revolution."

Implants may not cause disease

By Jay Reeves
Associated Press

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — A court-appointed scientific panel said yesterday it saw no proven links between silicone breast implants and disease, a finding that could hurt the claims of thousands of women suing implant makers.

Testimony by the independent, four-member committee will be videotaped for use nationwide in courts where women have filed suit contending implants made them sick.

"This adds to the trend of the past couple of years of courts rejecting the hypothesis that breast implants cause disease," said Doug Schoettinger, a lawyer for Dow Corning Corp., once the largest implant makers.

But Ralph Knowles, an attorney for women suing the implant makers, predicted the scientists' conclusions would not hold up under the scrutiny of cross-examination and wouldn't affect lawsuits.

Appointed by U.S. District Judge Sam Pointer of Birmingham to review conflicting scientific claims about implants, the scientists found no definite links between implants and systemic disease in four major areas: toxicology, immunology, epidemiology and rheumatology, the study of diseases of connective tissue such as rheumatoid arthritis.

Pointer oversees 8,600 implant cases nationwide.

Sjogren's syndrome, marked by unusual dryness of the mouth, may be linked to implants, the panel said. But its symptoms "are nonspecific and relatively common in any population group," they reported.

Never before has a panel been appointed to provide expert testimony in so many cases, Pointer said in an interview.

Sybil Goldrich, an implant recipient and activist, faulted the panel for not reviewing the medical records of women who have filed suit over their implants.

"Nobody looks at those until they get to a courtroom," she said.

The panel evaluated previously published studies about systemic diseases and their possible links to implants. Members did not consider "local" problems, such as risks posed by ruptured implants.

Thousands of women have sued companies blaming implants for sicknesses including lupus, rheumatoid arthritis, body aches, fatigue, memory loss and hardening of the breasts. Their lawyers claim science backs up the claims.

Manufacturers deny their products are dangerous and point to other studies that found no links between implants and health problems.

Pointer appointed the panel to sort out the conflicting scientific opinions, but an epidemiologist aligned with the women's side said that is not what happened.

"It would be misleading to say this report shows there are no problems. What it says is, 'We don't know,'" said Diana Zuckerman of the Institute for Women's Policy Research in Washington. The panel were: Immunologist Betty A. Diamond of the Einstein College of Medicine in New York; epidemiologist Barbara S. Hulka of the University of North Carolina; rheumatologist Peter Tugwell of the University of Ottawa in Ontario, Canada; and toxicologist Nancy I. Kerkvliet of Oregon State University.

Don't mess with Texas

Part one of a two part travel guide to Texas

This past holiday weekend, I had the honor of travelling with our Minuteman football team to Beaumont, Texas in search of a first round playoff win against McNeese St. Before accompanying the squad to Cowboy Stadium in Lake Charles, Louisiana, where the pride and joy of UMass proceeded to eliminate their arrogant hosts from post-season competition, I had a chance to patrol some of Eastern Texas for some culture consumption.

Seth Koenig

So, along with my sports cohort, Brett, I strayed from the cozy hotel in favor of the bright lights of Beaumont.

Without a car, my comrade and I were forced to wander by foot through some of the roughest roadside terrain I'd ever seen. The grass blades were extremely tough, yet wet enough to soak our sneakers through. Talk about being uncomfortable right off the bat.

Down the road, not far away, however, were the encouraging neon lights of a nightlife. Yeah, Brett and I were going to get some...

Unfortunately, the lights were deceiving, as we soon realized we were embarking on trip through brightly illuminated car dealerships and gas stations. And more car dealerships and more gas stations.

We trudged on, by random animal casualties of Texas drivers, and, after perhaps 45 minutes, stumbled upon a G.I. Surplus store. Neat, we thought, stylish black boots and camouflage pants that are all the rage in the North.

Not this time.

At this G.I. Surplus store, they had things that were really left over from wars; like stuff that had killed few enough people so that they could be resold to the general public. Outside the building was a life-size, swivel-based Howitzer, along with some sort of warhead. On the door hung a sign that read: "Armed guard on watch at night." Brett and I surveyed the scene for a sniper and then hurried along.

We soon realized we were embarking on trip through brightly illuminated car dealerships and gas stations. And more car dealerships and more gas stations.

As we mosied down the side of the road through air that left us breathing through a straw, we came upon the enlightened thought that there was more than just car dealerships and gas stations.

There were lawyers and mobile home stores, too.

We came to the conclusion that the only thing to do in Beaumont is a) buy a car, then b) get some gas, then c) shoot some trailer-dweller, then d) get a lawyer. Preferring not to put an attorney on the Collegian bill, Brett and I continued on.

Apparently amused by the fact that two youngsters were walking down the road, several truckers subjected us to drive-by honkings and screamings. Eleven times, to be exact, counting one time we were asked for directions and gas money by complete strangers.

An hour and a half away from the hotel, we found a pool hall. Brett absolutely demolished me in an hour's worth of billiards, and then we headed back to our pad... an hour and a half away.

Tired and hungry, our heroes stopped at a 24-hour, yep, you guessed it, gas station for some Doritos and Coke. Now, unlike 24-hour gas stations in New England, we weren't allowed to actually enter the premises. Like we were talking to a bank teller, we spoke through an opening in what was probably bullet-proof glass and received our food through a steel basket that opened both in and out of the store.

Noticing our unease at this strange situation (after all, how nice a section of town must one be in for the all-night gas station to be run like Fort Knox?), a local drunk approached us:

Yew folks ain't from 'round here, are ya'?

Nope (thank God).

Yew folks look like Yankees.

Red Sox, thanks.

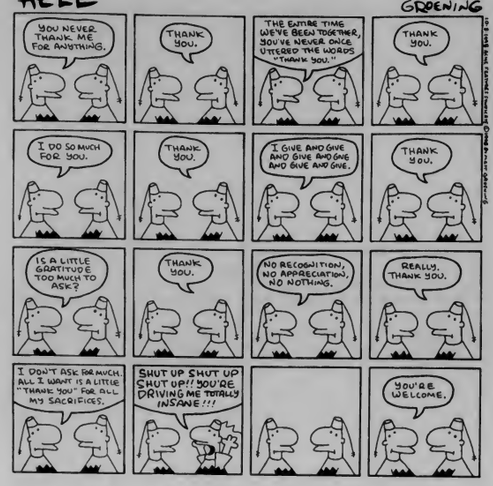
How come y'all can't be like us down here?

I guess we're not that lucky (or because we passed the third grade, whatever).

Where y'all from, anyhow?

Massachusetts.

Where's that?



Where's that? Way up north. (Your mom still ties your shoes for you, doesn't she?)

Realizing that we were in for some sort of physical engagement if we stayed to chat much longer, we politely excused ourselves and moved along.

At 1:30 a.m., we made it back to the hotel and watched obscene amounts of "Beavis and Butthead" and fell asleep. With the business section of the Houston Chronicle stuffed in our soaked sneaks, the two of us hoped for a more eventful Friday...

The future's so bright

I was standing innocently by the bowl of black olives, the aroma of turkey wafting through the air, pondering the impact of Luke Perry's triumphant return to 90210. It was building up to be a pretty good Thanksgiving I tell you. (Insert music from "Jaws" here.)

With tiger-like stealth, 83-year-old, distant relative so-and-so begins to make her way towards me. Her beady eyes targeting my very soul. She is ready to strike.

"Elsa, look at you," she squeaks, pinching my cheeks. "Why, you must be in high school already!"

Now, I stopped getting carded for rated-R movies a few years back, and although I'm no old crow, I think it look as though I may have already been to the prom.

Elsa Allen

"Actually, I'm a senior in college now."

"Oh, goodness. My how the time flies. Why I remember when I used to change your diapers, and now look at you, all grown up. What are you going to do when you graduate dear?"

Uh oh!

My eyes begin to shift around the room, desperately searching for an escape route. Sweat begins to form on my brow. I start to shake and my throat becomes dry.

Looking down at the floor I mumble, "I don't know."

"Well, May isn't very far away, you don't have a great deal of time dear." As if I didn't worry about my approaching graduation date every day. I surely didn't need somebody to be reminding me.

"Excuse me, I'm going to go help with the mashed potatoes."

Although I was able to escape that encounter relatively unscathed, Thanksgiving turned out to be one of the most threatening holidays of my young life. I began to worry, what am I going to do when I graduate?

The thoughts became overwhelming as I tracked my accomplishments within the past three and a half years.

No resumé, no internships, a little bit of waitressing experience, I was not looking like the perfect candidate for any sort of job. I don't think many employers have a need for semi-skilled waitresses that can write editorial columns about macaroni and cheese or Nintendo.

So, there I was, eating turkey and feeling pretty blue about my hopeless future. Then I had an epiphany.

So what, I thought to myself as I gracefully sculpted my mashed potatoes into a bust of Prince Charles. I have lots of talent. Maybe I'll roam around the world for a while, sculpting mashed potato busts of the entire Royal family. It was beginning to sound like a good idea.

If that didn't quite pan out I'm sure there are many other jobs that require a wackily creative, semi-skilled waitress with a liberal arts degree who has a vast portfolio of columns about Kraft.

The next night there was the typical holiday gathering of high school friends that I don't really talk to anymore. I thought I would be home free in this crowd. I was thinking about how I would pitch my mashed potato idea to them without sounding like a lunatic. It wouldn't matter, I thought, because I'll bet none of them have any clue about post-graduation plans either.

Wrong.

The valedictorian of my class, a fellow journalism major, begins to tell the story of how he was in London, you know, doing an internship for CNN. His mother called him to inform him that he had to fly to Texas to accept an award for being one of the top 15 journalism students in the country.

My jaw dropped. I decided to keep my mashed potato idea a secret, at least until I was assured that it would plummet me to stardom. Which it will.

I tried to change the subject.

"So, how 'bout that new stop-light they put up on the corner?"

What I realized by the end of the week was that it really doesn't matter. Everyone has a different agenda for their future, and if mine contains edible sculpture then it's okay. As long as you do what you want, and not what second- cousin so-and-so from Topeka, Kansas decides is "successful."

At least I know, whatever I do, I'll still be able to hang out with the really cool kids in the eleventh grade.

A winter's retail

In the next few weeks, many consumers will drive themselves crazy in stores and parking lots everywhere, searching for the perfect holiday gifts. They will flock to the malls in droves, drowning themselves in stress and anxiety much like lemmings — rodents who run en masse to the edges of cliffs and drown themselves in the seas below.

However, consumers are not the only folks who will be stressed and anxious this holiday season. People who work in the retail business will also be stressed and anxious because the bottom line is that they have to make a lot of money in the next few weeks or their stores may be history. For some managers in the retail business, the desire to make money will border on hysteria.

Alexis Pushkar

The only way to make money is to sell and to sell a lot. If you work on the floor in most stores in any given mall, your job is to sell, and the store manager's job is to breathe down your neck and make sure that you are selling. Every time you ring something up in the register, the machine takes note of how much each sales associate is ringing in, and there is often considerable pressure to ring up the most merchandise.

Sales associates have tough jobs. Although they look good in the $400 worth of Abercrombie clothes that they bought with all of their paychecks and part of their retirement funds, they work hard. Maintaining a pleasant attitude with certifiably insane and rowdy customers sometimes requires more calories than are needed to run a few marathons. In addition, the monotony of folding the same sweater fifty times a day begins to take a toll on someone's sanity, and instead of seeing snowflakes, they see albino spiders doing the mambo.

Not all stores put tremendous pressure on their associates to sell but most do, so in addition to keeping the store neat and fighting off irate grandmothers wielding canes of iron, associates must sell. What does that mean, "associates must sell?" It means that sales associates must be able to convince customers that a $900 Ronald Reagan key chain is more important than next month's food and send them into the parking lot smiling about it.

In essence, sales is a bit of a scam unless the consumer is somewhat cautious as to what he or she spends money on. However, it's not the sales associate's fault that the job description is "scam people." A sales associate is usually some poor slob who needs some dough, although the wages are as low as the company can possibly dole out because some corporate executive on a private island near Fiji wants to eat calves' brains, which for some reason is considered a delicacy.

Sales associates are just the last link in a chain of command which travels up through associate managers, store managers, district managers, regional managers, and a wide range of executives, before reaching the vice president and the president. The buck stops at the president, but he or she usually pockets it.

Sales associates and those who want to be sales associates don't have many bargaining chips in the Retail Game. (A version of this classic game is made by Milton Bradley and will be on sale this week for $39.95 at all K-Mart stores. You know Dad will love it.) Would-be employees need jobs, either full or part time, and if they need money badly enough, they'll take the wages they can get.

College students who only want to work during their vacations have even fewer bargaining chips since retailers loathe to hire people who are not loyal and dedicated to the company, even though companies have no qualms about cutting the hours of people who really need to make money if the overall business in the company is slow. In other words, companies want loyalty from their employees, but companies put making money before having loyalty for their employees.

This holiday season is the revenge of the potentially employable, and I encourage everyone to fail their classes and cash in on the retail market. Due to Massachusetts' low unemployment rate, there is a scarcity of holiday retail help this year in most major malls. Finally, those of you who need some cash to subsidize your malted milk ball addiction have some bargaining chips.

Employers are always at the mercy of their employees, and this year they are desperate enough to agree to anything. If employees want a raise and don't get it, they just have to go to the store next door to get the hourly wage that they want.

But don't stop there. Retailers are offering big signing bonuses this year, so all you have to do is stay at Larry's Utterly Useless Gifts For One Dollar store through February, and you get some extra cash.

My motto is: Never settle for anything less than what you want. I suggest asking for free health and dental care, even if you are only a seasonal employee. (Yes, companies are offering this option to part-time seasonal workers this year.)

Let your imagination run wild. You could have plane tickets to Martinique, full body massages from sexy androgynous beings in loincloths, yogurt with flecks of gold in it, and all the Ben and Jerry's Phish food ice cream you can eat. It's an employees market this year, and you should all take advantage of it.

Run, run, run like lemmings to the mall and drown yourself in some good fortune this holiday season.

SNOW SHOW '98
Mullins Center
Nov. 30

Radio station 99.3 certainly knows how to rock as they put on an astonishing show this past Monday night at the Mullins Center. With ticket prices at an all-time low for five talented bands, the individuals in attendance were left dazzled.

Soul Coughing's irregular rhythms and form struck a favorable beat at Snow Show '98 with success coming from the opening song of their set, "Soundtrack to Mary."

"Circles" followed, coming off their late September release, El Oso, and marked the official start of crowd surfing by those lucky enough to find room on the floor. This cut amusingly broke into Harvey Danger's "Flagpole Sitta" midway through the song that put the audience into an uproar.

The highlight of the evening was when lead singer Michael Doughty descended from the stage to grant a loyal fan backstage passes. Soul Coughing later dismissed the stage, but only after performing their breakthrough single "Super Bon Bon" off their sophomore release and leaving the frenzied crowd cheering for more.

THE OMD SINGLES
Orchestral Maneuvres in the Dark
Virgin

As usual the holiday season results in record stores glutted with best-of compilations. Hit collections from the likes of Mariah Carey, George Michael and Phil Collins grace the racks this year. Orchestral Maneuvres in the Dark, a.k.a. OMD, have snuck their own career retrospective into stores. The songs document the band's singles since 1979 when Andrew McClusky and Paul Humphreys formed the synth- pop duo in Liverpool, England.

Included here is the song that catapulted the band into the spotlight. "If You Leave," written specifically for Pretty In Pink, became a top-five smash for OMD. Some of the band's more noteworthy material came prior to this. 1980s "Enola Gay," about the plane that dropped the atomic bomb on Hiroshima, remains one of the '80s classic tracks.

McClusky closes the books on OMD with this collection. "After 20 years, it feels like the right time to bring down the curtain," he says. Co-founder Humphreys left in 1989. The band's previous label released a now out of print best-of collection that featured the hits up to that point. This collection repeats much of the original greatest hits collection. The omission of 1985's "Secret" enabling the addition of five tracks from '90s-era OMD is a poor choice as this single is another definite classic from the band. The newer material, songs such as "Call My Name" and "Dream of Me," failed to catch on in the United States and are undistinguishable from much of the Euro-pop churned out at the time.

The tracks recorded after the departure of Humphreys indicate, or at least suggest how essential he was to OMD's unique sound. While presenting many of the highlights of OMD's existence, the more recent material chronicles the decline of the band. "Walking On The Milky Way" signaled that the end was near when it was released in 1996. OMD sounded like the Beatles. It was an unfortunate end for a truly pioneering musical act.

Fans of OMD who own the previous greatest hits collection should search out the import only Remixes EP featuring a first-rate reworking of "Enola Gay" by Sash!, a delicate remix of "Souvenir" by Moby and a bizarre take on "Electricity" by The Micronauts.

Trax On Trax Off

The OMD Singles lets everyone discover a great band. The initial greatest hits was superb. It appears here in essentially the same form together with a few mediocre tracks, an informative essay wrapping up the band's career in the CD booklet and gorgeous cover art. A

PSYCHO
Music from and inspired by the motion picture
Geffen

The well-publicized remake to one of the most popular films ever made has a wealth of talent going for it. Though no one seems to be using it. Rather multi-skilled director Gus Van Sant chooses to Xerox Hitchcock's original genius, so why should composer Danny Elfman be any different? After proving himself to be one of the best contemporary film scorers, he thinks it's a good idea to replicate Bernard Herrmann's score for Psycho. Suffice to say he does an amazing job. You cannot tell that it is not Herrmann's original orchestration. But if you're a soundtrack nut, and already have the original Psycho soundtrack, you're going to need more than Bernard Herrmann's name crossed out and Danny Elfman's name written in its place to make this purchase worthwhile.

That's where artists like Rob Zombie, Girls Against Boys and Pet Shop Boys come in. By throwing in some radio hits, this old soundtrack turned new just might be marketable. "Living Dead Girl," also featured on Rob Zombie's solo debut Hillbilly Deluxe, seems laughably out of place with Hitchcock's original masterpiece. As do most of the tracks on this compilation — especially James Hall's cover of the Talking Heads' "Psycho Killer." But if one track takes your mind off the fact that this film is one of the strangest projects Hollywood has ever embarked on, it is the Pet Shop Boys' "Screaming." This track alone makes this soundtrack worthy of a listen. Not much else. C+ (Kevin Monahan)

Behind" from their self-titled, four-times platinum, debut album. Spectators also had the pleasure of witnessing the band perform "You" and "Changes" from this first release. The rest of their set was centered around their 1998 album, Happy Pills, which has yet to command the same amount of attention as their earlier material. The band's pathway back to success will depend on their latest single, "It's Alright," which raises fond memories of Candlebox during grander years. "10,000 Horses," another great cut off their latest disc was diligently performed previously in the set.

Most impressive was the performance of Western Massachusetts phenomenon, Mary's First, who proved that they deserved a much greater role than the opening spot. Fueled by powerful single "I Know," the band was able to captivate an audience that was unfamiliar with their creative lyrics. The group was able to subside their first-time large venue jitters and perform "For Awhile" flawlessly. Earlier this week, 99.3 Rocks Program Director, Adam Wright, passionately stated that "Mary's First is one of the best local bands to come out of this area in a long time." If Snow Show was any indication, this convincing unsigned band is a musical sensation in the infancy stages.

Harvey Danger was the second act of the night to hail from Seattle and started their set off right with "Private Helicopter," the second single coming from their very successful debut, Where Have All the Merrymakers Gone?. Presently touring and working on a new album, the act mixed in cuts from their only release with unrecorded material. Their chart-topping summer smash, "Flagpole Sitta," closed out their very well played set.

Less Than Jake's musical stylings and masturbation commentary fared well with some members of the audience, as this punk/ska band attracted a very loyal following to the Mullins Center. The band played relentlessly throughout the set as band members continued to unload the stage of water bottles, hundreds of stickers, and whatever else they could find to the moshing crowd below. "History of a Boring Town," caught the audience's attention, as it is the first cut to make it to the mainstream airwaves for this underground band.

a couple of months. Consider this a holiday shopping hint. What a great CD! The tracks here are the end result of the collaboration between Mo Wax label guru James Lavelle and sound sculptor extraordinaire Josh Davis, a.k.a. DJ Shadow. These two twiddled the studio knobs together and threw in a handful of guest vocalists to create a thrilling piece of work.

"Drums of Death, Part 1" kicks things off at a frantic pace amongst a space-travel theme before slipping into the guitar driven instrumental "Unkle Main Title Theme." The soulful sounds of "Blood-stain" follow with the smooth vocal styling of Alice Temple. "Unreal" comes next and features the same hollow drum sound that fans came to expect from DJ Shadow after listening to his spectacular "Entroducing. " disc that sliced and diced a wide spectrum of the world's sound recordings to create something beautiful.

Psyence Fiction is one of this year's stronger releases. Radiohead's Thom Yorke and The Verve's Richard Ashcroft recorded vocals for this project prior to the massive success of these bands' last albums. Ashcroft's contribution to "Lonely Soul" and Yorke's crooning on "Rabbit In Your Headlights" are two highpoints. Both songs are allowed time to grow into epic-length productions. The two tracks are an essential addition to collections of material by either of the bands.

Other guests include Mike D of the Beastie Boys and Jason Newstead of Metallica on "The Knock." The track is one of several that whiz along to a speedy beat. These are balanced out with several slower tunes like the ones featuring Ashcroft and Yorke.

Some of the samples are recognizable despite not being credited. "Celestial Annihilation" features a word from Grace Jones' "Slave To The Rhythm." Other sounds are recognizable as coming from other relatively obscure sources and nag the listener into trying to name that tune.

WASTE OF MIND
Zebrahead
Columbia

These five guys are the latest Orange County, California outfit to burst onto the overcrowded punk/rap/funk/hardcore scene that includes the likes of 311 and The Offspring.

Waste of Mind has its moments — singing duties traded by the band's two vocalists and the occasional wacky lyric. "Get Back" gives us "phatter than Nell Carter's right thigh." The disc remains a rather monotonous experience. The majority of the tracks share the same sounds and styles.

The surprise of the album is the creative, yet out of place "Fly Day" which incorporates disco elements. Ask your local modern rock radio station to play this cut and Zebrahead may have a hit song on their hands. C (Matthew Nixon)

WATER AND SOLUTIONS
For Immortal/Epic

In this, their third LP, Far has created a thoroughly enjoyable album. Water and Solutions may not be earth–shattering, but then again, it doesn't try to be. With a sound reminiscent of Sunny Day Real Estate, Far manages to keep their audience interested and amused.

Hailing from Sacramento, CA, Far consists of Shawn Lopez on guitar, Jonah Matranga on vocals, Chris Robyn on drums and John Gutenberger on bass. The first track on Water and Solutions, "Bury White" grabs the attention of the listener and holds it through all of the albums 12 tracks, to the closer — "Waiting for Sunday."

Water and Solutions is not anything that will catch the attention of the masses, but it is fun to listen to and definitely worth checking out. B+ (K.M.)

2PAC'S GREATEST HITS
2Pac
Death Row

My fondest memories of Tupac come from his old videos where he used to rock that slightly tilted backwards UNLV hat with a starter jacket to match. In his latest commemorative album entitled Greatest Hits, we are blessed with remembering his noblest achievements. Vintage tracks like "Trapped," "Brenda's Got a Baby" and "I Get Around" bring back the days before the east coast/west coast beef. Then there's the sentimental side of his 2Pac, reflected so eloquently in "Keep Ya Head Up," "Dear Mama" and his previously unreleased triumph "Changes," which features a unique Bruce Hornsby loop.

Since I was never the biggest 2Pac supporter, I have a hard time listening to the entire double CD. But if there was ever an album of his to own, this would be it. B (David Katzoff)

Webber pleads his case in the courtroom

UPPER MARLBORO, Md. (AP) — Occasionally defiant but under control, Chris Webber took the stand yesterday and denied striking a police officer and using marijuana before he was arrested on his way to a Washington Wizards practice in January.

"I had to go to work. It's not the time or place," Webber said when he asked if he had used drugs that day. "Not that any time is the time or place."

Webber is charged with second-degree assault, resisting arrest, disobeying an officer, marijuana possession and several traffic-related offenses stemming from a Jan. 20 traffic stop for speeding near the Washington Beltway. The arrest was one of several off-the-court matters that prompted the Wizards to trade Webber to the Sacramento Kings in May.

With testimony concluded, closing arguments are set for this morning. Prosecutors have said they will ask for jail time if Webber is convicted of the more serious charges.

Webber raised his voice twice in his defense, once to say "Yes, he was" when asked if arresting Officer Raymond Kane had lied when testifying for the prosecution, and again when describing the moment he was hit by pepper spray while sitting in the driver's seat of his sports utility vehicle.

Webber, who said he was talking to his lawyer on a cellular telephone at the time, testified he was sprayed three or four times flush in the face. Kane testified he sprayed Webber twice, with only one direct hit to the front of the face.

"It was not one time! It was not one-and-a half times!" Webber said. "I remember screaming to my lawyer, 'He's macing me!'" Webber was more composed, and even paused for a beat or two, when asked if he had smacked Kane on the hand.

"No," Webber said. "The last thing I want to do is be in a position like this. So, no."

Nutmeg legislature tries to make stadium plans

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — The Hartford area has enough residents, rich people and big corporations to pay for a $350 million football stadium for the New England Patriots without taxpayer support, a financial analysis showed yesterday.

The state would just about break even, gaining just $3.4 million over the 30 years of the bonds issued to pay for the stadium, road improvements and other amenities, the analysis by KPMG Peat Marwick shows.

"The governor has been very clear — he's been emphatic — that this stadium can be paid for by something that would not be a burden on the taxpayers of Connecticut. What this report proves is that the stadium does in fact pay for itself," said Brendan Fox, the chief legal counsel for Gov. John G. Rowland.

Many questions remain unanswered, however, including how much it will cost the state to move a steam plant on the proposed stadium site and how much a pollution cleanup would cost. The state also needs to find out whether costs can be cut by using tax surpluses to pay for some of the stadium in cash.

Legislative leaders said they had not read the report in detail and would not yet comment on it. The governor's budget office and a regional economic development group paid $57,000 for the study. The analysis found that the Hartford area's financial resources are comparable to many new National Football League market areas, including Jacksonville, Fla., Charlotte, N.C. or Nashville, Tenn. The stadium is estimated to cost $350 million, or $375 million when inflation is considered.

If the state pays for the stadium by issuing 30-year bonds, the state would run deficits of several million dollars for the first 10 years and would start to break even and turn a modest profit after that, according to the report. The state would recover most of its money through a 10 percent surcharge on ticket sales. The report also expects the state will gain millions through income taxes, sales taxes and other related business taxes.

The proposed 68,000-seat Patriots stadium includes 6,000 luxury club seats and 125 to 150 luxury boxes for corporations to buy. Besides 10 Patriots games a year, the study assumed the stadium would host six Division I-A University of Connecticut games a year and dozens of other events, from other games and concerts to monster truck shows.

The analysis did not assume the stadium was sold out for every game and did not figure in any penalties the state may have to pay if certain seats are empty for games. The report estimated the Patriots can sell at least 90 percent of the regular seats, all of the club seats and 80 of the luxury boxes.

"If attendance is better, revenues also would be better," said Dean Pagani, a spokesman for Rowland.

High-end seats are a major issue around the stadium's finances. At $4,250 for a club seat and $100,000 for a luxury box, ticket prices not included, a Patriots game would be pricier than most other NFL teams. For example, the Carolina Panthers' club seats go for up to $3,000, but there are almost twice as many of them at their stadium than are proposed for Hartford.

A memorandum of understanding signed by Patriots owner Robert Kraft and Rowland requires the state to pay for luxury seats that are not sold for the first 10 years — a potential $17.5 million annual expense that the Peat Marwick report did not consider.

Bruce Carlson, a special assistant to the UConn president, said Hartford's club seats would come with amenities other football stadiums do not offer. It would be open year-round, have special parking, include an athletic club and seats to all Patriots games. Club members also would have first crack at club seats for UConn games and other events.

The report also does not include estimates on the numbers of people who would travel to Hartford from cities outside the 75-mile radius, although it is assumed some residents from Boston to Bangor, Maine will also attend games.

"These are supposed to be conservative estimates," Pagani said.

A rosier report is being done, with larger audience projections and stadium sellouts. A worst-case scenario study also is in the works, with estimates on how much the state would pay in the club seat penalty and in case more money is needed to prepare the site.

Rowland and legislative leaders have said any state budget surplus above $250 million could be used to pay for part the stadium.

Comptroller Nancy Wyman yesterday projected the surplus at $247.4 million, but said the figure could go much higher if the economy does not falter. The nonpartisan Office of Fiscal Analysis has estimated the surplus will reach $329 million.

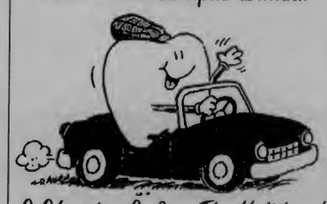
Ole Miss seems to have a coach

JACKSON, Miss. (AP) — Mississippi officials have wrapped up their search for a new coach, with Tennessee offensive coordinator David Cutcliffe the apparent pick.

Four days after Tommy Tuberville's departure to Auburn, Ole Miss scheduled a press conference for today to announce his replacement.

Officials would not confirm Cutcliffe's hiring, but all indications pointed toward the 16-year Tennessee assistant.



"We have narrowed this thing," Ole Miss athletic director John Shafer said by phone yesterday from the Oxford campus. "I'm worn out."

In Knoxville, Tenn., where No. 1 Tennessee (11-0) is preparing to play Mississippi State in the Southeastern Conference championship game, Cutcliffe refused yesterday to discuss the situation.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) — You may not be quite sure who your friends are at this time, but by day's end you'll feel compelled to ally yourself one way or another.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — Take care that an overbearing relative isn't allowed to tell you what to do from morning to night. You must enjoy some independence.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) — You can combine business with pleasure today only if you are willing to part with something valuable in exchange for something else.

Coyotes out to a blazing start in the 'Zona desert

Matt Despres on The NHL

Hockey in the desert?

A few years after the Winnipeg Jets packed up and shipped off to Phoenix, hockey purists everywhere are still having a hard time dealing with this concept, that the "Coolest Game on Earth" can be played in one of the hottest places around. The Coyotes were laughed at, for their location, for a complete lack of history and for those awful uniforms.

How many NHL teams do you know of that include a "Learn the Game" section on their official website? But all of the laughing and jokes have suddenly ceased, as the Coyotes are starting to bite back.

Through 18 games this season, Phoenix has cruised, currently sitting atop the league with a record of 14–2–2. By not allowing more than two goals in any of their last 17 games, and currently in the midst of a 14-game unbeaten streak, Phoenix is wiping the grins off all of those who doubted hockey could thrive, never-mind breathe, in the hot climate of Arizona.

So why the success? Jeremy Roenick, Keith Tkachuk, Rick Tocchet and Nikolai Khabibulin. That's why. Through the first quarter of the season, Roenick has posted 22 points, Tkachuk, 20 and Tocchet, 19, while Khabibulin pitched a shutout against Los Angeles his last game out.

However, Phoenix has done more than put together a few stars along with a solid supporting cast and hoped for the best. No, even with the anemic state that the NHL is in, this formula will not work. The Yotes have attacked with old- fashioned hard work and some devastating defense, which has allowed them to continue winning while scoring only 53 goals as a team.

You'd have to be pretty lucky to have predicted this season for the Phoenix Coyotes. In a year that has seen two of hockey's greatest traditions, Montreal and Chicago, suffer, and the once powerful Avalanche slip back into mediocrity, it's refreshing to see a story like this come from somewhere unexpected. And nowhere in the NHL is success more surprising than with a team from Phoenix.

• Although all the hoopla surrounding Phoenix is deserved, don't overlook what the Maple Leafs are doing over in the Eastern Conference. For a team that finished last in their division last year, resting on top of the entire conference is quite a place to be. It's no surprise that Mats Sundin has provided the offensive spark, nor is it headline news that Curtis Joseph has been giving opposing forwards nightmares. The Leafs have a well balanced attack that, barring disaster, should carry them well into the playoffs.

• Remember Peter Nedved? The former Pittsburgh forward finally ended his contract dispute with the Penguins when he was traded to the New York Rangers along with Chris Tamer and Sean Pronger for right wing Alexei Kovalev. Henry York and future considerations. With Pittsburgh financially in the red, they might want to strongly consider cash as part of the deal, and lots of it.

Lost in the messiness of the dispute was the fact that Nedved can be a fine hockey player, one who in 1995–96 had 45 goals and 54 assists while with Pittsburgh. It looks like he has regained that old form, scoring a key goal in his first game with New York.

• While Ed Belfour is enjoying another fine season between the pipes, his presence is being felt, and appreciated, further than the Dallas city limits. Jimmy Waite, who once served time as a backup to the "Eagle" in Chicago, is off to a great start with, who else, the Coyotes. His impressive numbers include a 5–0–1 record, a 1.15 GAA and a save percentage of .956.

The tutelage of Belfour has paid off elsewhere as well. Remember when Dominik Hasek rode the pine for the Blackhawks as Belfour was the number one man? Seems Eddie has the golden glove... and a job as a goalie coach when his playing days are over.

• Philadelphia Flyer left wing John LeClair capped off a week in which he was named "Player of the Week" by scoring four goals against Vancouver. That's no easy task, but everytime somebody does it you can't help but remember that even Vladimir Ruzicka pulled the trick a few years back when he was with Boston. Kind of brings you back to earth, doesn't it?

• With a rather slow week in the NHL, I have decided to use the rest of this space to promote my choice of "Game of the Week," which is none other than Pittsburgh at Boston on Saturday night. I take Boston by two, with Hal Gill scoring the game winner.

UM men's hoops drops second straight

College of Charleston get Minutemen in the end, 77–75

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

This time, the magic wasn't there for Massachusetts point guard Charlton Clarke. Down 70–64 to College of Charleston with 51 ticks on the clock, the senior hit a three– pointer to cut the deficit in half.

Sweet memories of last season's double overtime loss to Rhode Island started flooding the minds of the Minutemen. In that game, Clarke's buzzer–beating three sent the game into an extra period, while his three foul shots extended the contest to a second overtime before the Rams slid by for the win.

Despite the disappointing finish of that game, Clarke's heroics became legendary.

Another responding score by the feisty guard against the Cougars cut the lead down to three once again, 72–69, but when the time finally ran out, the Minutemen could come no closer than 77–75.

In a game of streaks, it was John Kresse's squad who had the last laugh. With 8:54 to go in the game, a Jody Lumpkin slam dunk put Charleston up, 52–50, and was part of a dominating 13–2 Cougar run.

UMass then spent the final minutes of the game trying to catch up.

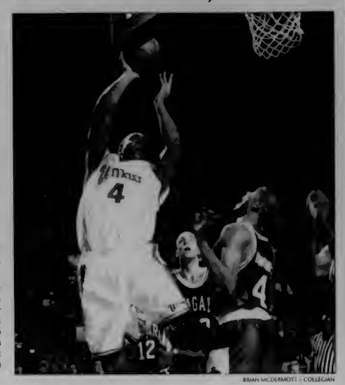
A Monty Mack trifecta brought the Minutemen to within one soon after, 54–53. Down 62–55 a few minutes later, Mack connected from downtown again, to stop a UMass scoring drought and bring the score to a closer 62–58, but his 34 total points would not turn out to be enough.

Lumpkin's 22 points and seven rebounds were plenty, though, as his play from the center position clearly outshined Massachusetts' All–America candidate Lari Ketner. The UMass pivot–man put only five on the scoreboard.

"Lari played awful," UMass Coach Bruiser Flint said, referring to the limited time his center saw on the court. Ketner was in foul trouble early in the game and, for the second straight contest, never quite found his rhythm.

Defensively, the Minutemen managed to shut down the Cougars' big scorer as well, holding senior Sedric Webber to only four points. Last year, in a UMass victory against Charleston at the Mullins Center, Webber scored 20 and grabbed eight rebounds. This season, the power forward had averaged 10.5 points and 6.3 boards going into the game, but like Massachusetts' big star, was a non–factor in this year's game in the rented–out North Charleston Coliseum in South Carolina.

What might have been a factor, however, was the nearly two week time span that passed between UMass' last game, a loss to St. John's, and this one.



"It's been long. I'll put it to you that way," Flint said. "We've just been practicing and practicing."

Out rebounded by a overwhelmingly smaller team for the second consecutive game, the Minutemen watched the Cougars gain control of 39 boards compared to their total of 26. With the size that UMass brings to the court, boasting four players at six–foot–10, Massachusetts apparently couldn't work the bugs out of their front–court problems in their extended vacation.

The wrinkles in the play of the forwards and centers has put an added weight on the shoulders of the less–celebrated guards.

In his last–second flurry, Clarke brought his scoring output up to 10 on the evening, but the senior was not nearly as effective as his backcourt mate, Mack. Back–up point guard Jonathan DePina played a solid first half, but seemed to slip behind the curtain as time went on.

The Minutemen will need to utilize their size in their next matchup, against Marshall on Dec. 5 in West Virginia.

Struggling Minutewomen squad to host Black Bears

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

What a difference a month can make.

At the beginning of November, the Massachusetts women's basketball team was just beginning its season. They were preparing to defend their Atlantic 10 East Division crown, and were the pre–season pick to win it again. Their goal was to capture the A–10 championship.

However, that was a month ago.

The Minutewomen will take on the University of Maine tonight at 7 p.m. at the William D. Mullins Center. When this UMass team takes the court against the Black Bears, though, it will be a team that is looking to try and revive a season that has started to go downhill.

The Minutewomen are entering the month of December with a 1–5 record and a far more dismal outlook than they had entering November.

In the past month UMass has fallen victim to several severe blows to their program. First, junior transfer and defensive specialist Tory Grant was dismissed from the team for violating team rules. An athletic and aggressive player, her addition to the team had been eagerly anticipated.

Shortly afterward, sophomore guard Kara Trent quit the team for unknown reasons. Although she was still developing her college game, Trent was a player who would have been able to make a definite impact on the offensive end.

After the loss of those two players, however, UMass was still looking fairly strong. They opened their regular season by soundly beating St. John's at home, which was followed by a loss to Boston College on the road, a game in which the Minutewomen managed to at least stay in for most of the game.

Next the Minutewomen traveled to Honolulu to take part in the Hawaiian Regent Classic, and the unthinkable happened.

Sophomore guard Kelly Van Huisen had returned to the squad this season after redshirting last year with a torn anterior cruciate ligament in her left knee. On Nov. 20 in the first game of the Hawaii tournament against Kansas, Van Huisen tore the ACL in her right knee. Now she will be forced to sit out this season as well.

A potential superstar for the Minutewomen, Van Huisen was the type of player capable of leading UMass to the A– 10 championship. She averaged 10.7 points her freshman year, and 15.2 last season before being lost for the year. Before her injury this year, she was looking as though she was ready to go back to her old self, putting in solid games against St. John's and B.C. Now the team will have to do without her services once again.

Also making a return to the team this season was junior Jaywana Bradley, who was also forced to sit out last year after having surgery on a torn ACL in her left knee. Like Van Huisen, she too was injured in the Kansas game, hurting her knee and her calf. Bradley, another athletic player who added depth to the offense, is currently listed as day–to–day. Although the hope is that she will be able to practice as early as next week, UMass may not see her in uniform for another month.

How the team will be able to cope from here on is the big question that the Minutewomen are facing. Will they continue to slide, or will they be able to pick up the pieces, as they did last season after losing Van Huisen, and make another run at the A–10 title?

UMass will now look to senior forward Tez Kraft. Kraft, who was named Most Outstanding Player in the A–10 tournament last year, overcame knee problems of her own and was a pivotal force on last year's squad. A first team preseason All A–10 pick, Kraft's play has been up and down this season. UMass will need her to become more consistent and to repeat her heroics of last year if they hope to save their season.

BRIAN McDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

After coming off an 18–point performance on Sunday against Georgia, sophomore guard Kathy Coyner will look to continue her sharp–shooting tonight against Maine.

NBA players and owners agree to talk after two weeks of stalled negotiations

NEW YORK (AP) — Locked-out NBA players felt another squeeze on their wallets yesterday before a glimmer of hope suddenly emerged. Collective bargaining talks, on hold for nearly two weeks, will resume tomorrow in New York with "everything back on the table," deputy commissioner Russ Granik said.

Commissioner David Stern and union director Billy Hunter spoke by telephone and agreed to a session involving the owners' and players' full negotiating committees — the first since Nov. 20.

"Billy called David and it was agreed that there are no deal-killers or other preconditions. Neither side is now committed to anything, and whatever was put on the table at the last meeting is now undone," Granik said.

Talks originally were scheduled to resume last weekend, but the sides found themselves arguing over what was agreed to in the Nov. 20 session and whether there would be preconditions for a resumption.

Owners are again asking for a 50-50 split and the players are asking for 60 percent of revenues. Each side had moved three percentage points in the Nov. 20 meeting.

"We're back where we started," Granik said. "We agree we're better off meeting than not meeting."

As the lockout moved into its sixth month, players missed their second payday.

For stars like union president Patrick Ewing, who was due to earn $18 million this season, that meant another lost $900,000 check.

"The unprepared players are the ones who are getting hurt," said Eric Snow of the Philadelphia 76ers, who should have had about $55,000 directly deposited into his bank account. "If you paid attention to the threats, you planned ahead and saved more money than you ever thought you'd have needed."

Snow took his agent's advice and salted away as much of last season's $700,000 salary as possible. His pay was supposed go up to $840,000 this season, but the length of the lockout means he'll lose at least one-third of it.

Snow figures he can make it another few months before deciding whether to liquidate some of his investments or take out a loan to meet his living expenses. Meantime, he's knows he might never recoup the money he's losing.

"It's a big bite, but you hope the sacrifice is substantially worth it in the end," Snow said. "You take a hit now and hope it benefits you later."

Snow's salary is actually small by NBA standards, falling below the average salary of about $2.4 million and the median of about $1.2 million.

Since the season won't start until January at the earliest, players also will miss checks Dec. 15 and Jan. 1.

Is it worth it?

"Well, the possibility of making even more money wouldn't be possible if we accepted the deal the owners have on the table. Guys who are now making the minimum salary won't move up the payscale if they deserve to," said Snow, who spoke by telephone from his home in West Bloomfield, Mich., where he spends his days working out with other Detroit-area players, including Rick Mahorn, Michael Curry, Carlos Rogers and Shawn Respert.

Of the approximately $1 billion players were supposed to earn this season, more than $300 million has been lost.

Agents, who receive four percent of their clients' salaries, also are feeling the pinch.

"It's not good, obviously, because nobody is in business to lose money," said agent Mark Bartelstein, who represents 18 NBA players. "But we're partners with our players, and this is a sacrifice everyone has to make in order for the business to move forward."

49ers begin to regroup after injury to B. Young

SANTA CLARA, Calif. (AP) — Bryant Young's agonized scream as he collapsed told Tim McDonald all he needed to know about his teammate's gruesome injury.

"I understand how the leg bends and it wasn't bending like it was supposed to," McDonald said.

Young, one of the league's best players and the San Francisco 49ers' defensive anchor, underwent surgery yesterday at Stanford Hospital, the day after fracturing both bones in his lower right leg in a freak, sickening collision on the field.

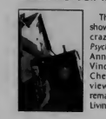
Team physician Dr. Michael Dillingham inserted a metal rod into the tibia, the main weight-bearing bone between the knee and ankle. The fibula, a smaller supporting bone, was set and will be allowed to heal on its own. He's out for the rest of this season and could miss a part of next season, as well.

"With all things considered, he seemed to be in good spirits and certainly he's getting a lot of support," said coach Steve Mariucci, who visited Young in the hospital before the surgery. "In speaking with Dr. Dillingham about the prognosis, he shared with me that there's a good possibility that B.Y. will play next season. Obviously, there are no guarantees, because a lot of healing has to take place and things have to go right."

Dillingham estimated Young would need eight to nine months of rehabilitation before trying to play again. Mariucci said former 49ers center Jesse Sapolu suffered a similar injury early in his career and was able to come back and resume a productive career.

"It's quite a loss for us," said Mariucci, who choked up at times as he spoke of Young. "It's a similar situation to when we lost Jerry Rice, which also was devastating and we needed to regroup and rally and pick up the slack."

Added defensive tackle Junior Bryant: There is not one person that is going to compensate for him. It is going to have to be all of us."



Young, San Francisco's first-round pick out of Notre Dame in 1994, had 9.5 sacks and was on his way to another Pro Bowl season when he went down in a fast, frightening sequence during the fourth quarter of Monday night's 31-7 win over the New York Giants. New York's Kent Graham scrambled out of the pocket and Young and linebacker Ken Norton Jr. closed in from opposite directions to make the tackle. Young had grabbed hold of Graham's jersey when Norton plowed into the fray and his helmet struck Young squarely on the leg.

With Young's cleat firmly planted in the soggy turf, his leg buckled, bending at a grotesque angle. Young fell to the ground, his anguish evident to anyone who saw his face or heard his screams.

"I could tell Bryant was hurting pretty bad," said Graham. "It was a Joe Theismann-type injury. It's something you just hate to see."

Activists' letter calls for release of 3

BEIJING (AP) — A group of Chinese democracy activists denounced the arrest of three prominent Chinese dissidents, accusing the Beijing government in an open letter yesterday of failing to comply with U.N. human rights treaties it has signed over the past year.

The letter, signed by 190 democracy activists, called for the release of Xu Wenli, Qin Yongmin and Wang Youcai — all outspoken organizers in a campaign to establish an opposition party that would challenge the Communist Party's monopoly on power.

The authorities "are deceiving and cheating international public opinion while on the other hand they are suppressing and persecuting domestic political dissidents," said the letter, faxed to foreign news agencies.

Boys in boxcar survive on beer alone

CINCINNATI (AP) — Two boys who hopped a freight train and got locked in a boxcar say they survived for more than a week by drinking the cargo — stale beer from mostly empty bottles being returned to a brewery.

"I didn't drink that much, just a little something to get my mouth wet," John Wayne Riley, 15, said yesterday. He said he lost about 20 pounds during the ordeal.

John said he and 12-year-old Billy Ray Grimes Jr. had jumped onto a slow-moving train in Hamilton on Nov. 23 to escape a beating from a half-dozen thugs chasing them. But authorities are suspicious of that part of the story, and Billy said they were running away from home.

About two miles up the track, they switched to another train, which John said he thought was headed back to Hamilton, about 25 miles northwest of Cincinnati. Instead, it was bound for the Miller Brewing Co. rail siding at Trenton.

SGA's motion allows press in residence halls

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

At last night's University of Massachusetts student government association senate meeting, a motion was passed to allow agents of the press not be discriminated against with regard to the guest policy.

Senator Aaron Saunders (Sylvan, at–large) who wrote the motion said he wanted to sign in a reporter from the Springfield Union News into his residence hall following the October 30 shooting of a resident there. Saunders said the residential director of the building asked the reporter to leave the premises.

"The reporter wanted to ask questions to the police upstairs," said Saunders.

Senator Rhian Hodges (commuter area) asked Saunders, "In this instance was the press being discriminated against or were the rights of the student who was the victim being protected?"

Saunders said he has been told by residence directors that there is an unwritten rule stating the press not be allowed into residence halls.

"When you sign in a guest they are your responsibility. If the guest harasses someone it is your responsibility," said Saunders.

Attorney General of the SGA Jesse Burchfield said if a member of the press enters the building to interview someone, it is that person's privacy being invaded, and not the that of the resident who signs them in.

Senator Dan Backer (commuter area) said the press, in the case of the Cashin shooting, put the life of a witness in danger.

"I know individually the witness and his life was put in danger because their name was published by some media asshole," he said.

"They don't care about your rights. The guest policy is not intended to sign in reporters."

Senator Paul Ferro (commuter area) spoke in favor of the motion.

"Backer is getting a little overly detailed. I don't want the University acting like big brother. We're all adults here. You take responsibily for the actions of the person you sign in," said Ferro.

The motion was passed with 20 senators voting in favor of it, 14 voting against it and 4 abstaining from voting.

At the beginning of the meeting, Senator Brandon Beane (commuter area), a member of the administrative affairs committee spoke before the senate about what he called "outright discrimination" against a fraternity member who wanted to become a new senator.

"During an administrative affairs meeting we heard from two prospective senators," he said. Beane went on to say that while the first prospective senator was recommended unanimously, the second was not. Because it

Honors college plan for housing changes upsets UM students

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

According to new plans proposed by the future Commonwealth College, to be in effect by fall of '99, students living in the residential area of Orchard Hill may be facing removal from their current living conditions.

Many students are upset that they were not informed of the plans until the informative session that took place last night in the Field classroom of Orchard Hill.

The new plan states that all incoming freshman honor students will be encouraged to seek housing in one of the residential areas designated as Honors Housing in Orchard Hill (currently Grayson/Field).

However, current residents are concerned that this act would mean an impediment upon current housing options and the opportunity to remain in the area of Orchard Hill in subsequent years.

According to the Honors Department, the implementations are in effect geared towards creating a more unified academic living environment for incoming honors freshmen, so they will be provided with the knowledge of academic resources at an early college experience.

The newly initiated and upcoming Commonwealth College, which will replace the honors program, is the University's attempt to bring about more academic, focused students to the University and in effect, increase the academic image of the University.

There have been other public universities that have competed with statewide funding for academic programs. The University was chosen to receive a grant and to solely use it towards re-developing the Commonwealth College.

Deputy Provost Norman Aitken feels no individuals will be forced out of their housing in the process.

"Their are around 500 vacancies in Orchard Hill every year," Aitken said. "Given there will be 500 incoming honors students, not all of whom will choose Orchard Hill as living space, I don't feel that anyone will be involuntarily thrown out."

Students disagree with the department's future plans for the area of the space. Junior Aaron Philmus dislikes the idea of moving towards an all honors academic area.

"I don't even live here, but it is endless how many people use this as their living environment," Philmus said. "I come here to seek the diversity of students that the hill already offers; I don't think there's much diversity in an all honors area."

Student Aura Spivak wanted a definite answer from the honors department as to a guarantee students would not be kicked out of Orchard Hill.

"No, I cannot guarantee that it will not happen, but we will help re–locate students because we need to compensate for all living environments," Aitken said.

Sophomore Kylie Kortland feels the steps are towards a divison of class.

"This seems to be an action to make the school look more prestigious," Kortland said. "In effect, you are disrupting the current living standards of many residents by making an elite distinction."

The Open Arms Project at the University of Massachusetts provides services to disabled students in hopes of inspiring the campus community into getting involved and becoming aware of the need to "open arms" to people suffering with disability needs.

The purpose of the project is to reach out to disabled students and individuals around the area through inclusion and getting them involved in different organizations and events. The Open Arms Project focuses on encouraging disabled students to interact within a group in hopes of better enhancing their social skills.

Their outreach involves forming good relationships between care providers, called "community companions," and the students needing disability assistance. Sophomore English major Renee East has been actively serving as a companion for the Open Arms Project.

"If there's a party on campus and a disabled person wants to attend, we will match them up with someone and have them go together," East said. "It's students helping students; it strengthens the bonds that may not have existed between two individuals."

East became involved in the project when she was offered one of the two internship position through the Department of Mental Retardation located on campus. Since then, she has become involved as a personal care attendant and a tutor.

"Most often it's not people with disabilities that we're targeting," East said. "It's also members of the community whom need to open themselves up and recognize the benefits in assisting people with needs."

East feels the University is aware of the needs for disabled and handicapped students and offers many disability services like learning support services. Disabilities service is another resource that helps students to access resources on campus. She feels, however, the problem in many cases doesn't lie in providing such resources, but in the lack of assistance in helping these people getting started socially on their feet.

"There are many services on campus for people without disabilities," East said. "We need to show that people with disabilities are human too."

She feels there is too often a distinguishable barrier separating the different needs of individuals on campus and hopes many students will be encouraged to help break this.

"We hope that in forming these relations, we are breaking the social barriers that exist between people with and without disabilities," East said. "Any person could get in an accident and become paralyzed. People think nothing like this will happen to them and they don't consider all the possibilities."

For the future, East is focused on going to law school and becoming an advocate for disabled students nationwide.

GOP gains access to Clinton memos

By Larry Margasak
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — In a victory for Republicans, a federal judge said yesterday that House Judiciary Committee investigators may inspect secret Justice Department memos on alleged fund-raising abuses in President Clinton's 1996 campaign.

Republicans said the ruling by U.S. District Judge Norma Holloway Johnson could upset the tight impeachment schedule. The White House, exasperated that it does not yet know which articles of impeachment Clinton might have to defend against, urged GOP House leaders to rein in the inquiry.

"I think they need to step up and figure out a way to get this thing resolved expeditiously because everybody... wants to get this behind us," spokesman Joseph Lockhart said.

Neither party wasted any time sending their staff members to the Justice Department to read the fund-raising memos. Republican chief investigator David Schippers went for the Republicans and staff member Kevin Simpson for the Democrats.

Clinton's attorneys were preparing a letter that would inform the Judiciary Committee whether they plan to present a defense before the panel wraps up its work.

AIDS awareness promoted through Student Union vigil

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Approximately 20 UMass students held a vigil on the steps of the Student Union on Tuesday, Dec. 1, to commemorate World AIDS Day 1998.

The students lit candles in honor of those who have died of AIDS, and several students spoke at an open forum in which they declared the importance of AIDS awareness and shared memories of friends they had lost to the disease. The vigil, which was organized by members of the UMass Pride Alliance, was one of thousands held worldwide.

World AIDS Day has been held since 1988, when the World Summit of Ministers of Health on Programs on AIDS Prevention called for an annual event in which to "open channels of communication, strengthen the exchange of information, and forge a spirit of social tolerance."

The theme chosen for this year's event was "Force For Change: World AIDS Campaign With Young People." Past themes have included "Sharing the Challenge," "Women and AIDS" and "One World, One Hope."

At the vigil, students stressed the disease's wide-spread effects. Felicia Lundquist, a resident assistant in Gorman Residence Hall, spoke about her mother, a "white, middle- class, heterosexual woman with HIV" who will be speaking at a seminar titled "AIDS Awareness and Personal Perspectives." The seminar will be held at Gorman Hall on Tuesday, Dec. 8 at 7:30 pm.

"Too many of us have lost too many friends and family to not do something in memorium," said Katie Herzig, who helped organize the event. She shared the story of a friend of hers who had contracted AIDS through his first, friend of hers who had contracted AIDS through his first, and only, experimentation with heroin.

Glenn Charbonneau, a fellow organizer, said that the evening's goal was to "draw people together to raise awareness about a disease that affects everyone."

The World AIDS Campaign stated in a press release that the goal of the campaign is to "mobilize young people to reduce the spread of HIV infection and to strengthen support for young people infected and affected by HIV/AIDS."

This year, much attention has been placed on the plight of sub-Saharan Africa, where it has been estimated that as many as one out of every seven inhabitants is affected with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS. On Tuesday, South African President Nelson Mandela said, "Come and witness the reality of AIDS. See the devastation in our community. See the fresh graves."

President Clinton has promised that $164 million in federal funds will be used for AIDS prevention and treatment. He has also announced his intentions to establish grants for the care of AIDS orphans.

The committee set a tentative schedule to conclude next week with final hearings and a vote on articles of impeachment. If any articles are approved, the matter could go to the House floor the week of Dec. 14. Lawmakers then could vote to send Clinton to trial in the Senate, censure him or do nothing.

Committee officials cautioned, however, that the schedule could be altered if investigators unearth any explosive new evidence in the memos written by FBI Director Louis Freeh and prosecutor Charles LaBella.

Johnson ruled that it was in the public interest for one Republican and one Democratic member of the Judiciary Committee staff to see the memos, which urged the appointment of a special prosecutor to investigate Clinton's fund raising and summarized evidence in the two-year-old Justice Department inquiry.

The judge said that neither of the investigators could copy the memos or take notes and that they could report their findings only to Rep. Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), the committee chairman, and Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, the senior Democrat. Any further dissemination would need the judge's approval.

came out in discussion that he was a member of a fraternity, Beane said, he was voted down.

"There are 10 commuter seats open. There are students not being represented. Certain voices are not being heard. I'm ashamed to be a part of this committee," he said.

"We shouldn't stand for it. People's own personal, private agendas are getting in the way and it's disgusting."

Beane said Senator Juliette Austin (ALANA caucus) made a case against recommending the senator specifically because he was a fraternity member. He also said he hopes someone in the committe will file a complaint with the judiciary board against her.

Austin said she did not want to make a comment at this time.

Beane also said he thinks the senator involved will attend the next senate meeting to speak, despite his negative recommendation.

Another motion passed in the meeting involved waivable fees showing up in the "Balance Due" section of tuition bills.

The author of the motion, Senator Ben Gaumond (John Quincy Adams) said students should be able to check off waivable fees that they wish to pay, instead of having them automatically be included in the "Balance Due" section.

"MASSPIRG and childcare [are waivable fees]. You should be able to check them so you don't owe money for something you didn't want to pay for," he said.

U.S. troops arrest alleged war criminal

By Mike Corder
Associated Press

THE HAGUE, Netherlands — U.S. troops yesterday arrested the highest-ranking Serb military officer seized so far in the effort to bring to trial Bosnians who are accused of war crimes. Radislav Krstic, a general, is accused of taking part, both personally and through his troops, in the massacre of thousands of Muslims after Bosnian Serbs took over the U.N. safe haven of Srebrenica in eastern Bosnia in July 1995.

He was indicted in October by the Yugoslav war crimes tribunal, which charged him with genocide, crimes against humanity and grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions on the treatment of civilians during war. The indictment was secret so he wouldn't be prompted to flee.

Krstic was arrested in a section of northern Bosnia controlled by U.S. troops serving in NATO's Stabilization Force, better known as SFOR. A spokeswoman, Maj. Sheena Thomson, said Krstic was arrested without incident at noon.

The chief prosecutor of the tribunal, Louise Arbour of Canada, called Krstic "a very significant military leader" and said his arrest was important to the tribunal's ability to continue to do its job. Krstic is the most senior officer seized so far for trial before the U.N. tribunal in The Hague.

Amor Masovic, the head of the Bosnian Muslim commission for people missing in the war, said he expected the arrest to shed light on the fate of more than 8,000 people missing in the Srebrenica region.

Muslim leaders in Bosnia expressed hope NATO would now focus on apprehending the key architects of the war, former Bosnian Serb leader Radovan Karadzic and his wartime military chief Gen. Ratko Mladic.

"We welcome this arrest and particularly the fact that they have started arresting generals," said Mirza Hajric, adviser to Bosnian Muslim member of the country's joint presidency, Alija Izetbegovic. "We hope they will soon switch over to commanders," Hajric said.

He added the arrest "could serve as a good example for the French troops who have not yet arrested anybody." Bosnian Muslims say Karadzic and Mladic are living in the part of the country under French control.

The State Department said the arrest served as a warning to other suspects still at large.

"All persons indicted for war crimes, including Radovan Karadzic and Ratko Mladic, belong in The Hague in the custody of the International Criminal Tribunal," State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said.

Bosnian Serbs criticized Krstic's secret indictment. Petar Djokic, president of the Bosnian Serb parliament, said it "brings uncertainty to people, a feeling that every citizen of Republika Srpska can be regarded as a potential war criminal in the eyes of the tribunal, and that SFOR is authorized to arrest anybody, anytime, anywhere." Republika Srpska is the Serb entity within Bosnia.

Krstic was the commander of the 5th Corps of the Bosnian Serb Army. He is believed to be a close associate of Karadzic and Mladic, who have been indicted for genocide for allegedly masterminding the massacre of Muslims at Srebrenica.

"Persons indicted for war crimes who are still at large should realize they, too, will be brought to justice," NATO Secretary-General Javier Solana said yesterday after the arrest. Krstic is the ninth war crimes suspect to be arrested in the former Yugoslavia by international forces. He was named head of the Drina Corps of the Bosnian Serb Army in 1995 after the fall of Srebrenica.

"Seeing that a hundred people showed up for this, I think a lot of people are happy with the way things are," sophomore Jason Reed said. "Just because someone is not an honors student, doesn't mean they study any more or any less."

The honors department will be meeting this week with Housing Services to discuss further actions into the Commonwealth College.

"I hope that you'll take the concerns we've given you and come back next week with something more concrete," said Orchard Hill Governer Mohammed Reza, who thanked the deputy provost and head of the Honors Program for attending the meeting.

Paula Jones lawsuit ends officially in Little Rock

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. (AP) — Paula Jones' sexual harassment lawsuit against President Clinton came to an official end yesterday when an appeals court dismissed it, citing the $850,000 settlement the parties reached last month.

The 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals put what is likely the final stamp on the lawsuit, through which the U.S. Supreme Court decided that a sitting president can stand trial for non-official actions and Whitewater prosecutor Kenneth W. Starr prepared an impeachment referral against Clinton.

In its order, the three-judge panel made no reference to the merits of Jones' appeal, which was argued Oct. 19.

"The joint motion to dismiss the appeal is granted subject to the terms of the out-of-court settlement which the parties attached to and incorporated by reference in their joint motion to voluntarily dismiss the appeal," said the panel, based in Saint Louis.

An Arkansas federal judge dismissed Jones' lawsuit April 1, saying the former state worker could not prove key elements of sexual harassment.

Jones claimed that Clinton, then Arkansas' governor, exposed himself to her in a Little Rock hotel room in 1991. Clinton denied the allegation.

The judge said the alleged boorish behavior, even if true, did not contribute to a hostile work environment.

Clinton last month agreed to pay Jones $850,000. Even though Jones had long wanted Clinton to acknowledge wrongdoing, the settlement said the agreement was not an acknowledgment of wrongdoing.

Elderly woman brutally murdered while on morning stroll

By Alison Fitzgerald
Associated Press

WALPOLE — For 10 years, Thomas and Irene Kennedy took a stroll each morning in the park, separating briefly to walk different paths through the woods.

When Kennedy's 75-year-old wife didn't return to their usual meeting place near Bird Pond on Tuesday, the 78-year-old retiree went looking for her.

He found his wife of 50 years bludgeoned and stabbed to death, lying a few feet from one of the paths.

The violent death of the homemaker and grandmother shook the Kennedy's neighbors in the adjacent town of Foxboro as police searched for clues yesterday.

"They were really the nicest people. They were devoted to each other," said Jane Baldwin, 58, who lived two houses away from the couple for more than 20 years. "I just can't believe it. I have no clue what happened. Was she in the wrong place at the wrong time? Did someone know their pattern?"

District Attorney Jeffrey Locke said the mother of four grown daughters may have been sexually assaulted. There was no sign of robbery, he said.

Mrs. Kennedy's partially clothed body was found in a secluded section of Bird Park, beyond a small hill and out of sight of homes surrounding the area.

George Nixon, who lives next to the park in this town 18 miles south of Boston, said so many people walk there each morning that it would be impossible for no one to have seen the killer. On Tuesday night, police searched the home of a 47-year-old man who lives at the edge of the park.

Move beyond Monica

Kenneth Starr has spent over $40 million out of the country's wallet to find out if Bill Clinton has (insert your own bad oral sex euphemism here). More important than money, our time has been spent just as exorbitantly.

It is in the country's best interest to move beyond the Monica Lewinsky and Bill Clinton matter, and forward. We should move towards better schools, better jobs and other issues pertinent to our success, instead of remaining stagnant in the cesspool that we're beginning to drown ourselves in.

Starr has worked dubiously over the last year, trying to hang the President politically. The Republican-controlled House Judiciary Committee is possibly widening its case to impeach the president by including evidence of illegal fund- raising during his 1996 campaign. Yet somehow Bill Clinton's popularity in polls is at the highest it's been during his term as president.

The collective voice of the country has said loud and clear that it is eager and ready to forgive the president for any wrongdoing, and move on. Some of them might have been angry, calling for a more morally responsible leadership. Others wished Clinton's dirty laundry had stayed piled up in his closet. But everyone is begging, "Don't make me hear another beret or cigar joke! We're ready to begin healing now!"

Hasn't our government's job always been to keep its ears tuned to what the voices of this country are saying? We know the answer, and the policy makers know it too, but answer it with a wink and a nod. Just like other issues in this country, the true core of the Monica Lewinsky case has gotten lost in political games. The problem is the Republicans and Democrats on Capitol Hill can't stop playing "nanny-nanny-boo-boo" long enough to hear what Americans are saying.

So what happens if we decide to impeach the president; what is the grand purpose of all this? We will be setting a precedent that our leaders must put their personal lives on the table, and let the world examine them. If we refuse to accept that even leaders' lives are as dynamic and three- dimensional as their constituents', we will be left with a minuscule pool of candidates. A pool of candidates who are not truly reflective of real human experience or tribulation.

The country's economy is at an all-time high and if you ask people, they say they're satisfied with the way things are going. The only ones who are still hanging on to "Monica- gate," are cagey political pundits and morning radio disc jockeys short on shtick. The rest of the country wants desperately to just get over it.

IMPEACHMENT QUESTIONS...

Kids movies

Ryan Benharris

Being the movie buff that I am, the highlight of my long weekend after Thanksgiving was a trip to the movies with my little sister to see Babe: A Pig in the City. While sitting in front of a big screen among about 200 screaming kids, watching a talking pig give orders to a farm full of inferior animals, I realized something that really made me think.

Did you ever notice how the film industry will make a kid's movie about pretty much anything? No topic is too ridiculous, and as long as they can rake in millions of dollars, companies like Disney and Warner Bros. don't really care how stupid of an idea the movie is. What's even more crazy about the whole thing is that no matter how bad the idea for the movie is, kids will still revolve their whole lives around forcing their parents to take them to see it.

Everyone can remember during their childhood the movies that we were just dying to see. I remember when I was little I stood in line to see the Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles Movie at least three times. Now that I look back I really can't imagine why four masked warriors who live in the sewers and talk to a rat would be enticing to me in the least. However, the kids' movies today are much worse than they were 10 years ago. When they made Air Bud all I could think was, "I've been playing basketball for 18 years, and this movie's telling me that a dog has more talent. Thanks for the vote of confidence Disney!"

The fact that they made a sequel called Air Bud 2: The Golden Receiver simply disturbed me. The worst part about it was the end, when the kid brings his dog to a Seattle Seahawks game and it runs on the field and intercepts a pass from Warren Moon. I would love to be at the stadium at a real Seahawks game, and watch what happens if someone tries to get their dog in. I can't even get into Foxboro Stadium, without being strip searched for a bottle of soda. Can you imagine what they'd be looking for on the dog?

The reality of all these kids movies is that there is no reality in any of them. I used to love the Ernest movies. Though Ernest Goes to Camp and Ernest Saves Christmas are classics, the one that sticks out in my mind is Ernest Goes to Jail. In one scene of that movie, Ernest dresses up like a woman to try to get out of prison.

Now, I'm no professional psychic or anything, but I'm sure that if Ernest went to jail and dressed up like a woman, the next installment in the series would be Ernest goes to the Proctologist. Hey Vern! Put it away, that hurt!

The real question is whether or not society really needs Ernest P. Warell. Would any of us really be that affected if the next movie was Ernest takes a Bullet Upside the Face? It would probably be the only funny movie Jim Varney's ever made!

We all know who the king of kid's movies is. Though, a good guess would be Pee Wee Herman, but that's the correct answer if I'm looking for the king of the all-night video store. I'm actually talking about the monster known as Disney. Disney's the absolute best example of kids' movies that make no sense. The cartoons that they make usually have some sort of moral to go along with them, and the story is usually good, but it's those awful low budget attempts at comedy that I don't understand.

I'm pretty sure that no one would have the power to watch Rocketman all the way to the end to watch him save the world during his trip to space. In the same sense, did Disney think that That Darn Cat would be a money making machine? I don't think so.

After watching Babe this weekend, I came up with an idea. I'm going to make a kids movie that all the kids will be so anxious to see; I'll become an instant millionaire. It's going to be a cartoon love story with the voices of Bobcat Goldwaith and that annoying woman from "The Nanny."

The lead characters, Max and Christine, are star-crossed lovers, who will never get together on the account of Max's severe case of V.D. It's only until Max goes to the Crazy Jesus guy to find out the true meaning of life (we're all going to hell) that he'll have the strength to overcome his battle with gonorrhea.

The soundtrack will include a hit single, "Had I only wrapped it up" by Vanessa Williams, and it'll be fine family entertainment. Look for the release sometime next Christmas.

Fair game

Dan Viens

Imagine this: you're playing a game of chess (even if you don't play chess just bear with me). Only this is no ordinary game of chess. You start out the game knowing none of the rules and your opponent is well-versed in all of them. Even though your opponent already has a huge advantage, he decides to cheat every now and then.

Now since you don't even know the rules, it is nearly impossible to detect when the cheating is going on. As the game goes on you begin to grasp the concept a little bit. Then finally your chance comes to execute a very good move, but your opponent is so intimidating that you decide to make another move which accomplishes nothing. In this scenario not only will you lose every time, but you will be slaughtered day in and day out.

This is not unlike the relationship between the typical college student and the typical police officer. This is especially true when it comes to the issue of search and seizure. When that dreaded knock sounds at Joe College Student's door and he sees that cop at his peep-hole the usual reaction is for him to run around his room wondering what he should do.

Considering the fact that cops aren't known for clarifying situations, a student's ignorance of how to handle himself can make the difference between him spending the night in bed and spending the night calling his friends to come down to the police station to bail him out.

Before I continue let's get one thing straight. No matter how you want to look at it the students and cops at this school don't see eye-to-eye. I'll even say that the cops on this campus dislike the student body. Forget the fact that without the students they are out of a job. Forget the fact that without this University their families wouldn't have food on their tables and their little sons and daughters wouldn't be opening up presents on Christmas.

The UMass Police's top priority at this school is not to protect us and to solve serious crimes. Their top priority is to bust kids who have the two most dangerous weapons ever known. These are of course marijuana and beer. Because of this we have to be prepared to deal with the cops when the time comes.

The most important thing to understand when dealing with the police is that we all have our Fourth Amendment rights. Drill this into your head kids. We have a right to privacy, we have a right to do whatever it is we want to do as long as it is in our own room. This right is reserved for us by the fourth amendment to the United States Constitution.

Here are the rules if you ever plan on winning a chess match against the police. First and foremost in order for a cop to search your room they must have a warrant. If they do have a warrant you have the right to examine it, but you do have to let them in. There are a few catches to the warrant, though. The first one is that they must search only for the articles expressed on the warrant. In other words if they are looking for stolen television sets and they find a bag of weed in a shoe box, you can't be arrested for that.

Also the police may only search the premises expressed in the warrant. If you live in a suite and they are searching another room and they see something in your room they are not allowed to look around unless they get another warrant.

The next type of search is where all of the grey areas come into play. This is a consent search. A consent search is when an officer show up at your door and asks your permission to search your room. Even if they hear a party or smell marijuana you don't have to allow them entrance into your room.

I know as well as anyone that police are very intimidating and it is difficult to say no to them, but it is your property. If at first you get scared and let them in you still have rights. At any time during the search you can tell them that you want them to stop searching. Anything that they find after that will be inadmissible in court.

Also you may consent to a limited search. You could say, "Sure officer you can come in, but you can only search my desk." The biggest drawback of the consent search is that anything in plain view is fair game. So if you invite them in to search your desk and they see a bong on the opposite side of the room then you will be under arrest.

"We have a right to privacy, we have a Fourth Amendment right to do what we want to do, as long as it is in our own room."

Please always remember that whether a cop bangs on the door and says, "Police, open up," or, "Hello, this is the police. Pretty please with sugar on top may we search your room," what they are really saying is that they want you to forget about your Fourth Amendment rights so they can search your room and arrest you.

One other thing that students don't seem to understand is the concept of probable cause. Many people think that probable cause means that when the police smell or hear something that they can search. This is dead wrong.

Probable cause means that the police have cause to get a warrant. If the police smell marijuana outside your room they can't just march right in. They have to go to a judge or clerk magistrate to get a warrant first. Hopefully, in that time you will have gotten rid of your incriminating evidence.

Don't think that you are alone in this fight. The people at legal services are there to help and advise you for free. Also please don't misunderstand this whole thing I am not advocating illegal activity. All I am saying is that college is a rite of passage. We have some responsibility, but not much. We may do some foolish and sometimes crazy things. If you know the rules of the game you won't have to be reminded of these foolish things in 25 years when you look at your record.

Letters to the Editor

Military regimes supported by U.S.

To the editor:

Witnessing the Radical Student Union's demonstration against U.S. policies concerning Iraq on the 20th of November, I was struck most by the Republican Club's voice of opposition. The chanted "God bless America" was of particular interest because I never imagined the almighty agent of all-knowingness/lovingness would grant such honor upon a nation whose foreign policy is so riddled with contradictions.

While it's nice to believe America stands for and defends unalienable human rights, democracy and global freedom, one small problem arises — it's not reality. The truth is that the U.S. government, for the past 50 years, has given support, protection and billions of dollars in subsidy to brutal military regimes throughout the world at taxpayer expense.

The list of countries we've aided in this fashion via institutions such as the International Monetary Fund, World Bank and (hooray!) the CIA is a surprisingly long one that includes East Timor, Indonesia, El Salvador, Zaire, Brazil, Nicaragua, Argentina, Saudi Arabia, Uruguay, Guatemala, Chile and yes, Iraq until 1989. The collective death toll reached with our complicity can be conservatively estimated as clocking in around 1,700,000!

The principle underlying these dictator-friendly policies is pretty elementary — they maximize profit. American and other first world corporations have a field day doing business with these countries because totalitarianism is so darn efficient. Dealing with minorities which monopolize a nation's state/economic power goes more smoothly than with a democracy whose citizens may actually demand costly frills like environmental protection, human rights or living wages in their contracts.

Given all this meddling in foreign affairs, it's quite surprising that the American public knows so little about it. This is not for lack of international documentation (the U.N. and independent human rights studies are not scarce) but for lack of mainstream coverage. How could this be, though? The answer is another fairly simple one. Most of the media is owned by an oligopoly of immensely powerful corporations whose economic interests are intertwined with those interests that support subtle, yet violently antidemocratic programs. In this light, is their silence really so surprising?

One final thought for the Republican Club. Next time we "Bomb Saddam Until He's Red, White and Blue" and you find yourselves in a shouting match with the Radical Student Union outside the Campus Center, you may find it morally more consistent to chant "God Bless Duplicity." Or, if that's not enough jingoism, "God Bless Totalitarianism" always works for me.

Tomorrow, director Gus Van Sant unleashes his remake of Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho. Pathetic money making scheme or artistic homage? Two split-sides on the issue.

High angles, low angles — and new angles

Rob Roensch

Gus Van Sant's upcoming remake of the Alfred Hitchcock classic Psycho is raising eyebrows all over movieland. Why on earth would a respected, if eccentric, young director dare to redo the work of the master of suspense himself? And what about other movie remakes that seem to be everywhere these days, like Meet Joe Black's Brad Pitt-izing of Death Takes a Holiday?

The new Psycho isn't even the first retelling of Hitchcock this year. Psycho follows in the footsteps of this summer's cold A Perfect Murder (a retelling of Dial M for Murder) and the recent TV version of Rear Window, starring Christopher Reeve in the wheelchair-bound lead role.

Can movie remakes be interesting in their own right, or are they always unnecessary symptoms of a lack of creativity and/or a movie studio reusing old material?

One way to answer this question is to say that certain works of art are locked away forever in the canon of "classics," never to be tainted by the touch of inferior hands. Another way to answer is to say that movies are never fixed to one meaning, that they are capable of being viewed from more than one angle. While a certain amount of respect for the classics is necessary, true artistic progress will only occur if movies remain open and alive to reinterpretation.

First of all, the criticism that movie remakes are wrong because they "steal someone else's ideas" are just ridiculous considering the places movies have stolen story ideas historically. The list of works of literature adapted for the screen is staggering, not to mention works for the stage and TV shows.

Why shouldn't stories in movie form be "stolen" in just the same way? If movie remakes are already artistically bankrupt, what about movies that don't steal their ideas, but steal instead techniques and plot lines? Any time a movie is all irrelevant because it is so reminiscent of Hitchcock's methods? Is Quentin Tarantino remaking Jean-Luc Godard? Martin Scorcese rip-off?

Clearly the process of borrowing is more complex than simply copying. Most remakes don't merely repeat the same story, but instead revise it, present it in the style of the time. Psycho is unique in its faithfulness to the original version of the story, but Van Sant adds color films and perhaps a few new twists. It's not only a remake, it's a gift to movie fans.

Literature has a long history of remaking old stories. Shakespeare, the head of the Western canon himself, was a master thief, lifting plots from ancient folk tales and history books. No one can argue that Shakespeare wasn't an original, but his greatest gift wasn't in inventing stories, it was in telling them. Art isn't just in the story, it's in the way the story is told. Hitchcock himself lifted stories from other sources and drama, even going so far as to remake his own films.

Often, remakes don't live up to the vision, they deepen it. One example is the recent version of Rear Window, with the paralyzed actor Christopher Reeve playing the role of a man confined to a wheelchair who believes he is witness to a murder. The role was originally presented as a man immobilized only temporarily by a broken leg. The revision adds an entirely new perspective on confinement and injury.

However, just because good movie remakes are possible doesn't mean that they are good. The new Rear Window, despite an interesting idea, received lukewarm reviews. Like any other movie, movie remakes must be good movies in their own right. A remake doesn't owe anything to its source material, but it also can't lean on the reputation of its predecessor.

Maybe the new Psycho is just a scary as the original, or maybe Vince Vaughn will be more goofy than twisted. Maybe the new Psycho will be nothing more than an exercise in duplication. But maybe it will have something new to offer. First, it must be able to stand on its own.

The real murderers of Psycho

Bryan McAllister

There may have been 10 rooms and 12 vacancies in the Bates Motel, but the biggest vacancy is in the minds of the Hollywood movie executives who greenlighted the Psycho remake.

I really hope that it fails miserably. I really hope that Anne Heche never makes a movie again, not because of her personal life, but because she's just plain annoying. I really hope that Vince Vaughn stops trying to be an real actor and just does romantic comedies with Swingers. But overall, I really hope that Psycho just collapses under its own audacity and makes less money than a Flipper sequel.

First, let me explain for such a cynical viewpoint. I should admit that Gus Van Sant, the director behind this pitiful attempt, is a talented if not brilliant filmmaker. But recently, perhaps due to the box-office failure of To Die For and other recent efforts, he's been synonymal of a sell-out. Good Will Hunting provided Van Sant with no artistic gain, but a nice one for his wallet. And Psycho will probably do the same.

It can be argued that the new remake of Psycho will allow Van Sant to do things Alfred Hitchcock could not, like insert in cons and avoid censorship, or perform camera techniques that weren't possible in 1960. Or you could say that Hitchcock frequently remade his films, so what's wrong with a remake?

Plenty. To shoot a remake of The Man Who Knew Too Much because it was flawed. Psycho doesn't need to be fixed; it ain't broke. And further, the remake isn't even trying to fix it. It's merely a shameless exploitation of genius.

True, Psycho was far from Hitchcock's best film. That title belongs to Vertigo, or Rear Window, or Notorious — not about 10 more films before Psycho. Instead, the black-and-white 1960 film was Hitchcock's ultimate publicity stunt, a feat of pure audience manipulation made on a shoestring budget.

So it's only fitting that Van Sant will turn its remake into a publicity stunt of equal proportions. The eccentric director shot with the same quick schedule, same script, 95 percent of the same camera shots and recreated the same Bernard Herrmann score. Van Sant set out to remake the same film part Hitchcock did. This is all very clever, but the question remains — what's the point?

A.) to make money, B.) to make money, C.) to make money, D.) to add some nudity and more violence, cause then it will be really cool, and D.) for Van Sant, producer Brian Grazer and the rest of Hollywood to fuel their already Ballcon-sized egos.

Call me a film purist, but the new Psycho is an attempt to steal the mind of perhaps the greatest filmmaker of all time.

There are even more problems with casting. Anne Heche is an accomplished actress, but she doesn't exude the vulnerability that Janet Leigh mixed with her blonde hotness. Leigh was also a genuine Hollywood icon, meaning her death early in the film was all the more shocking. More so, though, Vince Vaughn is a horrible choice for Norman Bates. For all his cookie-cutter and screen presence, Vaughn's only way of acting like a psycho is a few nervous giggles. Anthony Perkins was much more subtle, playing up his sincere, boy-next-door-ness personality.

But it's director Van Sant who deserves the most criticism, by attempting this homage, he's really saying, "I'm as good as Alfred Hitchcock." Then he'll be applauded for the new twists he puts on the story. Gee, how creative is it when 95 percent of the artistic work is already done for you?

I appreciate Van Sant's obvious respect for the Master of Suspense. As a kid and even now, I relished the carnage of my idols and often imagine that it was I who produced the work. It's eerie like when you were a kid and took a magic marker for a microphone, turned up the radio full blast, and imagined you were a rock star. But it was a fantasy. Van Sant is making that fantasy a disgusting reality. If anyone should take a shower, it should be him. Make it a cold one.

Debating the authenticity of film remakes

The remake of Psycho debunks sparks controversy in the eyes of film scholars, but everyone knows that Hollywood has been pulling stuff like this for years. Remakes of classics are nothing new. They are the epitome of Hollywood law. If at first you do succeed, do do it over and over again.

But would think that after the dismal failure of director Andrew d'The Lengthies') Davis's A Perfect Murder, a remake of Dial M for Murder, Hollywood would have forsaken the idea of remaking a Hitchcock film. Turns out, no Gus Van Sant is committed to the idea that Psycho would work. (Want a minute didn't Brian De Palma already do a remake of Psycho? Oh no... that was one of his own original films. But his film Obsession was undoubtedly a remake of Vertigo.)

Hitchcock was the master. Nobody did it better. The only one who could re-make a Hitchcock film, and make it better was Hitchcock (The Man Who Knew Too Much). But, what bothers most about this new Psycho is the question of "why would anyone want to do something that was done very well the first time?"

Remakes queen Meg Ryan starred in last year's City of Angels and has 4 remakes coming with You've Got Mail.

Opening night for Guild

Collegian Staff

With the end of the semester rapidly approaching — accompanied by late night cramming sessions, last minute paper writing and being on the verge of mental instability — the University of Massachusetts Theatre Guild is offering some comic relief to ease our suffering with their fall production of You Can't Take It With You, this weekend.

This zany romantic comedy is sure to give even the most stressed student some relief from the end of the semester blues. You Can't Take It With You is set in the 1930s, at the home of the eccentric Sycamore family.
